P R E F A C E

This is the eighth Volume in the series India's Foreign Relations, published annually in cooperation with the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India. Set up in 2006, this Division is the public face of the Ministry, reaching out to the think-tanks, academia, civil society and industry both within and outside of the country and interacts with them on the contours of India's foreign policy.

Today there is a paradigm shift from treating foreign relations as an esoteric subject to one of wider debate and discussion. The information explosion, and consequent dissemination of foreign policy related information through the electronic media and the proliferation of newspapers and other sources of information has made the aam admi aware of what goes on in the world and how his life is impacted by events in the global village. He wants to be informed how the foreign policy initiatives of the government would make his life better and secure. The government today whether in India or elsewhere cannot take a decision behind closed doors and expect the people to back it too. That is an onerous challenge a democratic and responsive government has to contend with today— to carry the message of foreign policy to the people at large and keep them informed.

India with a population of a billion and one of the largest and fastest growing economies of the world is of interest globally to scholars, academia, diplomats and industry alike. There is a need to reach out to them. The scientific study of foreign relations requires easy availability of original documents as tools of research and analysis. It is the fond hope of this editor that the present series is performing that task.

Over the years the bandwidth of India's foreign relations has increased many folds. Subjects which were not part of foreign policy discourse like, nuclear and thermal energy, climate change, terrorism, financial and monetary issues, trade and investments etc., are today routinely discussed both at the bilateral levels and international gatherings. India is also dialogue partner and/or member of major international organizations/conferences like G-5/G-8, G-20, BRIC, RIC, SCO, EU, ASEM, ASEAN, BIMSTEC, EAS, CICA, IBSA, SAARC, NAM and many more. All these engagements generate a volume of documents which necessitate inclusion. However the bulk has grown to an extent that it has become difficult to handle. The resort to electronic technology has become the obvious solution to which recourse has been made in the present case. While the printed volume provides the ready reference to the totality of material made available, by placing the text of some of the documents in the accompanying Compact Disc (CD), the bulk has been brought within a reasonable limit. It is hoped the users too will find this format convenient.

The documents have been, as in the past, categorized thematically and region-wise as necessary. Those which do not fall in any particular category and deal with two or more subjects/countries have been placed in the General List with cross referencing wherever necessary.

During the year there were changes at the top echelon of the Ministry. After the general elections in the new Cabinet constituted by the Prime Minister in May Shri S. M. Krishna took over as External Affairs Minister replacing Shri Pranab Mukherjee. At the Minister of State level, Shrimati Preneet Kaur and Dr. Shashi Tharoor replaced Shri E. Ahamed and Shri Anand Sharma respectively. At the top official level there were changes too. On superannuation of Shri Shivshankar Menon on July 31, 2009 Shrimati Nirupama Rao took over as Foreign Secretary. On the superannuation of Shri N. Ravi and on the posting out of Shri Nalin Surie, Ms. Vijaya Latha Reddy took over as Secretary (East) and Shri Vivek Katju as Secretary (West). Shrimati Parbati Sen Vyas took over as Secretary (Economic Relations) from Shri Hardeep Singh Puri on his being posted out as Permanent Representative of India at the United Nations in New York.

In undertaking this task I have as in the past, received help from several sources and friends. I remain indebted to them. Shri TCA Rangachari as always has been generous with his time and went through the Introduction rather meticulously and his advice and critical comments helped to rhyme the text. Many thanks, Sir. Having said that let me hasten to add that I remain fully responsible for any deficiency that may be found either in the Introduction or any where else in the book.

INTRODUCTION

I

As India entered the penultimate year of the first decade of the second millennium it found itself active player in a multi-polar world constantly shaped by the forces of globalization. Multi-polarity is a fact of the contemporary globalized order which India as a pluralist society readily accepted. It sought to address a number of global issues and challenges through multilateral consultations at multilateral fora. Effective multilateralism requires understanding and respect for mutual concerns, needs and aspirations of its interlocutors. It is only in this way that coordination and cooperation can develop. The dialogue at the multilateral level enhances the mutual understanding or respect so that the issues of peace, security and development that require bilateral or multilateral cooperation can be effectively addressed. It is in this sense that India's membership and participation in plethora of multilateral organizations/conferences has to be seen. Today India is a member of all important inter and intra regional and international organizations and has been called upon to actively participate in their conferences around the world to help find a solution to global problems whether of a political or economic nature.

2. Unlike prosperity peace is indivisible and it is the key to development and prosperity. Domestic peace cannot be separated from external peace. In determining the foreign policy each country big or small looks to establish peace to attain prosperity for its people. If domestic peace depends on external factors, prosperity of a nation too depends on mobilization of both internal and external resources and hence the need for a peaceful environment becomes critical. Since India's external environment has been threatened by external forces fighting a proxy war, India's search for peace and security has become most urgent. Resources which should have been deployed for development had to be perforce diverted to internal and external security. Peace and security which are the constant prime objectives of any country's foreign policy become more urgent in the case of India. It is the fight against forces of destabilization in the garb of terrorism that drives the energies of the Indian foreign policy establishment today. It must draw the attention of the international community to the scourge of terrorism from which ever source it emanates and whatever the justification of the cause it seeks to propagate or espouse. Its efforts have brought in mixed results. As the terrorism spreads its tentacles to take more and more nations in its grip, there is greater realization of the Indian point of view that it is a global menace and unless the international community cooperates and acts in tandem, it will not go away.

3. India's need for peace and security is further buttressed by the plethora of problems of development it faces. It is an energy deficit country. Energy is the engine that brings in its train growth. Much of the sources of energy lie beyond its borders. Both to obtain and carry them home, peaceful environment and cooperation of international community is a prerequisite.

4. Concern for Climate has become another impediment to accelerated growth. Clean energy is the new mantra of growth. Faster economic growth has brought in its train its own problem of pollution and green house gas emissions. Temperatures are rising, glaciers are melting much faster now than at any time in the past, threatening to sink small islands and coast lines out of existence. It is a global problem and has to be tackled at the global level. If one were to look back, this problem of climate change has its origin in the consumer societies of the west, who have over the years merrily been eating away into resources of the earth and polluting the environment. Instead of carrying the full burden of correcting the historical injustice, they wish to transfer their burden to the new emerging economies thus further retarding their growth. India is however clear that the control of GHG emissions must be "founded on the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities". The burden of guarding this principle falls in the realm of foreign policy too. These are new challenges that the foreign policy establishment has to face and develop the expertise for it. The challenges are increasing with the shrinking of the world.

5. In a little more than six decades since India's independence, a plural and diverse nation has with considerable success welded together a democratic political order as also has achieved considerable progress in social and economic development. Economic growth, modernization and the pace of technology driven changes have transformed Indian society at a pace that it has leapfrogged into the new millennium as a galvanized nation. The cliché 'Hindu Rate of Growth' is passe. Now it hits 8 to 9 % and even double digit growth. India is now engaging the world with unprecedented confidence and dynamism as never before. Express highways, super power stations, mega projects dot its landscape. A vast network of railways connects its various regions more closely than ever before. Our open skies are witnessing traffic jams. India is now more linked with the global economy than it has been for centuries. A major slice of its GDP is accounted for by the external sector. India's needs from the world have changed, as are world's expectation from it and so its capabilities.

Climate Change

6. The international discourse during the year was dominated with the concern for environment and climate change. As pointed out above, the rising temperature caused by GHG emissions was impacting the global climate threatening the very existence of small island nations and vast coastal areas. Rapid industrialization and use of thermal energy as engine of growth was identified as the culprit causing the problem of emissions. Energy being the catalyst for development, a large number of countries emerging from long colonial rule, had taken to the route of rapid industrialization for their economic development and therefore the need for more and more power houses, the problem of green house gas emissions became critical. The attention of the world environmentalists was naturally drawn to the gathering clouds of green house gases. The carbon dioxide emitted by the burning of hydro-carbon by the automobiles and emissions from power houses fired by coal and oil were identified as the principal reasons for it. With better technologies it became possible to control automobile emissions, the problem finally centered on the super-thermal power stations which were being set up in rapid succession around the world. The real polluters were the nations of the west who during the last two centuries had indiscriminately used thermal energy for their industrialization. The new emerging economies were rather late entrants in the field. The keenness of the west to pin the responsibility on the new emerging economies was stoutly resisted by the latter who insisted that it was the western countries who had to address the historical problem more than what they expected the new economies to do in this direction.

7. The international community was seized of this problem for some time but it gathered the critical mass in 2009 in the run up to the Copenhagen Conference in December. During the year there were many rounds of pre-Copenhagen consultations. The year opened with the Delhi Sustainable Development conference in February. It was attended among others by the Princess of Thailand, Presidents of Finland and Kiribati, Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Secretary General of the United Nations, former Presidents of Maldives, Switzerland and former Prime Minister of Senegal among many other luminaries. The Delhi Conference on Climate Change, Technology Development and Technology Transfer in October was attended by 58 delegations, of which 30 were at the ministerial or vice ministerial level. Recalling the Beijing High Level Conference of November 2008 it reaffirmed its commitment to the objective, provisions and principles of the UNFCCC. Other international conferences in the run up to the COP were the Bonn conference in April, the Bangkok in October, Barcelona in November and finally Copenhagen preparatory conference in November itself. In addition, the SAARC countries met in a special conference in October in New Delhi to work out a common position for the Copenhagen. To work out a national consensus, New Delhi too decided to take the state governments into confidence and called a special meeting of the State Environment and Forests Ministers in August.

8. Apart from these conferences which were convened especially and were devoted entirely to climate change, the multilateral conferences held during the year too had it on their agenda. The BRIC Summit in Yekaterinburg and the BIMSTEC in June, G-8 and G-5 Summits at L'Aquila in Italy and the NAM Summit at Sharm El-Sheikh in July, the G-20 Summits at London and Pittsburg in April and September respectively, the India-ASEAN Summit at Hua Hin (Thailand) in October and the India-EU Summit in New Delhi in November too discussed it substantially. The subject was considered so important by the CHOGM that when it met in Port of Spain in November, it held a special session exclusively devoted to its discussion. President Sarkozy of France who had nothing to do with the Commonwealth otherwise, dropped in at Port of Spain to participate in its deliberations, as also the Prime Minister of Denmark. The UN too held a Round Table in New York in September. Sadly, the final CoP at Copenhagen in December, attended by over hundred Heads of State/Government, despite din and excitement it generated, ended inconclusively to the disappointment of all particularly the developing countries, which had pinned a lot of hopes on it.

9. India's negotiating position was summed up by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his message to the nation before leaving for Copenhagen on December 17. He said "the UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol embody the international agreed regime for addressing the global challenge of climate change" since these were "founded on the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities". Therefore as a responsible member of the international community he assured the world that India "was fully committed to working with the rest of the world to preserve and protect the environment" based on these principles.

10. Before the Conference, India too announced unilaterally that it would reduce the emissions intensity by 20-25% by 2020 as compared to 2005. In June 2008 India launched a comprehensive Action Plan on Climate Change and the eight National Missions were set up to achieve its objectives. New Delhi was not unwilling to go a mile further provided there were credible arrangements to provide both additional financial support as well as technological transfers from developed to developing countries in support of programmes for developing clean energy.

11. On June 12, 2009 at Bonn, India had joined 36 other developing countries from Asia, Africa and Latin America, to move an amendment to the Kyoto Protocol which suggested that developed countries committed themselves to GHG emission reduction targets that were considered to be minimum required in view of the enormity of the challenge that the world was confronted from climate change.

12. As stated above, and contrary to expectations, the Copenhagen Conference of Parties held in December after two weeks could not produce a legally binding document. Instead there was a political statement which was not endorsed by the participating countries as a legally binding document. (This was subsequently confirmed officially by the UNFCCC in a notification addressed to the parties by its Executive Secretary Yvo de Boer that since the COP neither adopted nor endorsed the Accord, but merely took note of it; its provision did not have any legal standing with the UNFCCC process even if some parties decide to associate themselves with it.) Disputes between rich and poor countries and between the world's biggest carbon polluters - China and the U.S. - dominated the two-week Copenhagen conference. Tens of thousands of protesters took to the streets and staged demonstrations, to demand action to cool an overheated planet.

13. The political statement contained few specific commitments and a still fewer specific figures or timelines in the global fight against climate change. The UN Secretary General Ban ki-Moon put it tersely: "The Copenhagen Accord may not be everything everyone had hoped for", but added this decision "is an important beginning". He however expressed the hope that it would transform itself into a legally binding treaty in a year's time. It was not adopted failing a consensus, since some delegations had strong objections. Lack of general agreement forced the Chairman to announce it as a "reference document", a political declaration which was not a decision under the UN framework. Hence the countries were left free to add their name to it if they accepted it.

14. The Accord promised a mobilization of $100 billion in annual funding for developing countries to meet the challenge of climate change from 2020 and also pledged about $30 billion by 2012. It set a target limiting temperature increases to a maximum of two degrees Celsius, but failed to specify the greenhouse gas emission cuts that nations needed to commit themselves to, in order to meet that goal. There was also no deadline for global emissions to peak.

15. The Minister of State for Environment and Forests briefing the Parliament on December 22 about the outcome of the Copenhagen Conference said: "The Accord recognizes the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities of the Parties in combating climate change. The Accord recognizes the need to limit the global temperature rise by 2050 to below 2 degree Celsius above pre-industrial levels. While doing so, the Accord clearly sets out the goal in the context of equity and sustainable development. This ensures that in achieving this goal, the right of the developing countries to have an equitable share in access to global atmospheric resources cannot be ignored and is ensured. I might add here that this was a point repeatedly made by the Prime Minister in all his interactions."

16. Regarding peaking of global and national emissions, the Minister said that it was accepted at Copenhagen and included in the Accord that the "time frame for peaking will be longer in developing countries" compared to the developed. It also bears in mind that "Social and economic development and poverty eradication are the first and over riding priorities of developing countries". Minister Jairam Ramesh claimed this to be another "area of success" and "consistent with the position of India as outlined by our Prime Minister over two years ago that our per capita emission will never exceed the average per capital emissions of the developed countries."

17. One of the concrete steps agreed upon at the conference necessary to achieve the funding of some of the programs under the Accord, Mr. Ramesh said was to set up a Climate Fund named "Copenhagen Green Climate Fund". It will seek to provide resources "approaching US$ 30 billion during the period 2010-2012 to support the adaptation and mitigation actions of the developing country Parties. The funding for adaptation will be focused on the least developed countries, small-island developing States and Africa. They have also undertaken a commitment to mobilize US $ 100 billion a year by 2020 for such purposes and a high level panel will be set up under the guidance of Conference of Parties to review the progress of these commitments."

18. One major outcome of the Climate debate at Copenhagen was the emergence of the BASIC Group comprising Brazil, South Africa, China and India who not only coordinated their positions at Copenhagen but also vowed to work together in their endeavour not to let the developed countries walk away with a solution at the cost of developing and least developed countries at any future international gathering of this nature. Mr. Ramesh in his Statement in the Parliament emphasized that their unity was instrumental in ensuring that the Accord "was finalized in accordance with the negotiating framework as laid out in the UNFCCC, Bali Action Plan and the Kyoto Protocol". He added that the BASIC countries would "continue to work together" along with other countries of the G-77. The Minister made a significant announcement that the US President Obama in helping to forge the Accord at the end interacted with the BASIC countries, which ensured that "the Copenhagen Accord was clinched to the satisfaction of all present," and that the Basic Group succeeded in getting through with its proposals on global goals and on monitoring and verification besides that "the Copenhagen Accord was not legally binding and that there was no mention of a new legally binding instrument in the Accord."

19. New Delhi after carefully studying the implications of the call given in the non-binding statement conveyed to the UNFCCC Secretariat its association to it on January 30th, 2010 by pronouncing its domestic mitigation actions to prevent climate change. It said it would endeavour to reduce the emission intensity of its gross domestic product (GDP) by 20 - 25 percent by 2020 in comparison to 2005 levels. This is the same position which India had earlier unilaterally and voluntarily announced. It was once again made clear that this was a voluntary offer and will not have legal binding character, and this action did not apply to agricultural sector. That it was not a binding accord was once again affirmed by the Minister Jairam Ramesh in Lok Sabha on March 9, 2010. He said: "Accord is a political document and not a legally binding one. The Accord is not a separate track for negotiations outside the UNFCCC and the purpose of the Accord was to bring consensus in the on-going two track process. The two tracks on which talks will continue from April 20, 2010 are the Long Term Cooperative Action on Climate Change and extended Kyoto Protocol."

20. The battle of Climate Change now moves to Mexico where the next COP will take place towards the end of 2010. But before that the battle will be fought at many pre-Mexico conferences.

Civil Nuclear Energy Cooperation

21. If the year 2008 marked the end of nuclear apartheid imposed on India by the international community since the nuclear implosion of 1974, the year 2009 was one of consolidation. The Agreement for Civil Nuclear Energy Cooperation signed in 2008 with France was ratified in 2009. Another similar agreement was signed with Russia too whereby it will help India to set up two additional nuclear facilities. From being an outlier, India was now accepted as a partner in the global nuclear domain. The success of the civil nuclear initiative engendered a sense of assurance and confidence which enabled New Delhi to look, proactively and not defensively, at a new global agenda for nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament.

22. The concern for climate change through green house gas emissions became the primary motivation to promote the use of nuclear energy. According to some estimates a nuclear power plant in its life cycle emits only 3.24 grams of carbon dioxide per kilowatt hour, much less than fossil fuels. Shrinking stocks of fossil fuel and other sources of thermal energy, make it doubly necessary to promote the use of nuclear power. Research and development of nuclear safety technology has enabled the world to cross the threshold of fear and safety from radiation, which had gripped the world, particularly the countries of the west in the eighties, fanned by the Greens movements in Europe. India's clean record of non-proliferation of nuclear technology too had prompted the members of the NSG to consider the waiver in favour of India. In February 2009 India signed with the International Atomic Energy Agency another mandatory agreement for application of safeguards to civil nuclear facilities. This would further facilitate the process of cooperation with many more countries in the coming years.

23. In 2009, among the countries that agreed to extend their cooperation in this critical area were Mongolia, Canada, the UK, Kazakhstan etc. In February Russia signed with the Department of Atomic Energy a contract for the long term supply of 2000 tons of natural uranium pellets for its Pressurized Heavy Water reactors and another contract for about 60 tons of Low Enriched Uranium (LEU) pellets for Boiling Water units at Tarapur. The Hindu on July 16 quoting the Chairmen of the Nuclear Power Corporation Ltd. SK Jain reported that besides Russia India had also received natural uranium as yellow cakes from Areva of France for use in its safeguarded reactors. Mr. Jain said on July 14 that India had also received clearance from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) for the fabrication of this imported fuel into fuel rods. The process was now underway at the Nuclear Fuel Complex (NFC), Hyderabad, he said.

24. In October India identified four sites for setting up new nuclear reactors. The sites identified were Chhayamithi Viri in Gujarat and Kovvada in Andhra Pradesh for US and Jaitapur in Maharashtra for the French reactors. The Russian collaboration was for reactors at Kudankulam in Tamil Nadu and Haripur in West Bengal. During the year India too issued a letter of intent for up to 10,000 megawatts of U.S. nuclear power reactors.

25. There were some areas of concern too. The US President had announced his intention to seek ratification of the CTBT and its universalisation as one of the principal instruments of international security architecture and a key measure of non-proliferation and disarmament. India's reservations on the CTBT were already well known. The Declaration issued by the G-8 countries on Non-Proliferation at their L'Aquila Summit in Italy earlier in July, and the references in it to the transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology to non-signatories to the NPT, did cause concern to India albeit temporarily. New Delhi wondered whether an effort was being made by certain countries to deprive it of its newly won waiver!

26. In responding to the concerns raised in the Indian Parliament on July 13, Finance Minister Mr. Pranab Mukherjee, who had led India's negotiations for the nuclear deal in 2008 as External Affairs Minister clarified that only IAEA and NSG were the appropriate agencies in so far as the policy of nuclear trade was concerned and individual countries belonging to whatever group, could only decide individually whether they want to enter into trade with India or not.

27. The visit of US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to India in July became handy to clear the doubts. When questioned on this, she categorically denied any such intention and assured her interlocutors that US did not want to go back on what had been achieved already. Even before the start of Ms. Clinton's India visit signals from Washington were positive. The Press Trust of India reported from Washington that the U.S. on July 16 had said it was "fully committed" to the nuclear deal with New Delhi and hoped to sign the end-use monitoring agreement. "We hope to be able to sign that [end-use monitoring agreement], and obviously, that will take place .... next week," Assistant Secretary of State for South and Central Asia Robert Blake told reporters in Washington on the eve of Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's visit to India. "I do not think there should be any apprehensions about the future of the civil nuclear agreement," Mr. Blake told reporters. "The [U.S.] Secretary and the President are fully committed to that agreement. I think the Indians are also fully committed," he said. "They [India] are going to be, I am sure, moving forward to file a declaration of safeguarded facilities with the IAEA, which is sort of the next step in that process, and then we're going to start reprocessing talks, probably either later this month or in August," Mr. Blake said. The Press Trust of India further reported from Vienna on July 25 quoting Department of Atomic Energy sources that India and the U.S. had completed the first round of consultations on 'arrangements and procedures' for reprocessing of spent fuel of American origin on Indian soil. Incidentally the end use monitoring agreement was signed during the visit of Ms. Clinton in July.

28. The Prime Minister wishing to put an end to any such apprehensions as a result of the L'Aquila declaration himself made the position clear in Parliament. Replying to the discussions in Parliament on his visits abroad the Prime Minister told the Parliament on July 29 that "as far as the G-8 is concerned, the fact is that we have no civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the G8 bloc per se. We have, however, signed bilateral agreements with France, Russia and the United States. As I have said before, and I repeat it here, when I raised this matter with President Sarkozy, he was gracious enough to tell me that as far as France is concerned, there will be no restrictions. He also said that if we want him to go public on this, he will do so. Therefore, there is no consensus in the NSG to debar India from such technologies. We expect that the countries concerned will honour and implement their bilateral commitments."

29. The concern for non-proliferation reverberated at the UN as well when fourteen Heads of State/Government of the member countries of the UN Security Council met in a special session on September 24, under the president-ship of the US President Barack Obama, since the Presidency of the Council for that month rotated to the United States. The Summit adopted a Resolution on nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament.

30. India not being a member of the UNSC, was anxious that its views must be before the Council on this sensitive issue. In a preemptive move, a day earlier on 23 September 2009 India's Permanent Representative at the UN Ambassador H.S. Puri, conveyed to the Council, through a letter containing India's approach and perspectives on non-proliferation as well as its reservations. That New Delhi was assured before hand that the Resolution was not directed against India, was clear from what the Prime Minister told the Indian media at Pittsburg on September 25. He said: "We have been assured that this is not a Resolution directed at India; and that the US commitment to carry out its obligations under the Civil Nuclear Agreement that we have signed with the United States remains undiluted. That, we have been assured officially by the United States Government."

31. Ambassador Puri's letter while emphasized New Delhi's "unwavering commitment to global efforts for preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery" too sought to point out the infirmities of the non-proliferation regime that have had an adverse impact on Indian security. Supporting the "the two global and non-discriminatory international conventions banning chemical and biological weapons and efforts for strengthening their implementation" the letter recalled the former Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Action Plan of 1988 and said: "Nuclear disarmament can be achieved through a step by step process underwritten by a universal commitment for global elimination of nuclear weapons". India reminded the Council that in order to address the "threat posed by all nuclear weapons to international peace and security it required global elimination of nuclear weapons on a non-discriminatory basis" and "while preventing proliferation is important, an excessive focus on non-proliferation does a disservice to the essential principle of the mutually reinforcing linkage between disarmament and non-proliferation."

32. India suggested that "International efforts in this regard should build the necessary confidence among states so that international treaties and agreements are multilaterally negotiated and freely accepted which remains the true test of their legitimacy and credibility." The letter strongly felt that "states should fully and effectively implement the obligations arising from the agreements or treaties to which they are parties" and that India did not find any specific role for the UN Security Council, which should arise only "if those treaties themselves provide for such a role".

33. In November Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh visited Washington and met several leaders of the US including the President and raised this issue of US cooperation in civil nuclear energy Sector. He was assured as he himself told the Indian media on November 25 "the Government of the United States remains committed to early implementation of Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement." Admitting that "there are some minor problems with regard to agreeing on the reprocessing dedicated facilities that is mentioned in the 123 Agreement" he said these were "not insurmountable barriers, and I am confident that in the next couple of weeks we can sort out these things." He confirmed to the media that the civil liability legislation had already been approved by the Indian Cabinet "and we will be going to Parliament to enact the legislation that is required".

34. The Prime Minister "welcomed President Obama's initiative to host a Summit on Nuclear Security in April next year" and expressed the hope that "our countries can play a vital role in strengthening global resolve to prevent terrorists from gaining access to materials and technologies related to weapons of mass destruction".

35. On the Fissile Material Cut Off Treaty (FMCT) India held a consistent position: envisaged it as a significant contribution to nuclear non-proliferation in all its aspects. It encouraged the negotiation and early conclusion of a multilateral, universally applicable and effectively verifiable treaty on Fissile Material Cut-Off at the Conference on Disarmament. It may be recalled that the Bush Administration had signaled a change in policy, to insist that the FMCT should have no verification procedures and that national means would be relied upon for ensuring compliance. The July 18, 2005 Indo-US Joint Communiqué stated that the two countries would cooperate to bring about an early conclusion of the FMCT in Geneva. The nature of the treaty was left deliberately ambiguous, because India continued to favour multilateral verification procedures. This is also the consensus view among Conference members. India therefore welcomed the Obama Administration's reversion to this consensus and shown its preparedness to work together for the early conclusion of an FMCT.

36. New Delhi drew satisfaction from the fact that as the year 2009 ended, its rearguard action to preserve and consolidate the gains of 2008 had been successful.

37. While India was consolidating and extending its area of international cooperation, an avoidable controversy was raised in the media by some interested elements regarding the success of the Tests conducted by it in May 1998. It died soon enough as the Atomic Energy Commission on September 5 came out with full facts regarding the types of Test conducted, estimated yields, and other essential details to set at rest any doubts. The Prime Minister himself confirmed the success of the Tests.

Multilateral Cooperation*ASEAN and East Asia Summit

38. In August India signed with the ASEAN two agreements on (1) Dispute Settlement Mechanism and (2) Trade in Goods under the Framework Agreement on Comprehensive Economic Cooperation and a Protocol to Amend the Framework Agreement on Comprehensive Economic Cooperation. This it was hoped would give a new momentum to trade development between India and member countries of the Organization.

39. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the Ministerial meeting of the India-ASEAN described India's engagement with ASEAN as the central element of its "Look East" policy which was initiated in the early 1990s. This relationship had grown steadily and acquired qualitatively new dimensions, particularly since 2002, when India began its annual Summit level dialogue with ASEAN.

40. The Prime Minister visited Hua Hin (Thailand) in October to attend the 7th India - ASEAN and the 4th East Asia Summits. Overall India's trade with ASEAN amounted to about 10 per cent of India's global trade. It grew at a healthy rate and stood at about US Dollars 48 billion in 2008.

41. The importance of the ASEAN lies in the fact that it is a region that comprises of about 600 million people where the nominal GDP is about 1.7 trillion US dollars. India's relations with the ASEAN countries overall assumed greater salience in the last few years. Particularly, after the emergence of the global economic and financial crisis. It was a matter of satisfaction for India that overall, Asian countries including the ASEAN were able to deal with the after-effects of the global financial crisis with a certain degree of confidence and success. The India-ASEAN Summits are occasions to review the progress in relations with ASEAN countries. India's enhanced engagement with the ASEAN was at the heart of India's 'Look East' Policy.

42. Dr. Manmohan Singh announced the ASEAN countries were deeply appreciative of the fresh initiatives announced by India, to establish an India-ASEAN Round Table, for the preparation of a Vision Statement for our relations till the year 2020, marking of commemorative events in 2012, and offer of assistance of up to 50 million US dollars to fund various projects under the ASEAN Work Plan for the period 2009-2015. He described the conclusion of the India-ASEAN Trade in Goods Agreement as a concrete step forward in the process of India's integration with South East Asia. As a follow up to this Agreement, India agreed to expedite the finalization of the Agreement on Trade in Services and Investment.

43. The 16-nation East Asia Summit, established in 2005, comprises the ten ASEAN countries and 6 others, Australia, New Zealand, India, China, Japan and South Korea. It has developed a wider vision of cooperation within Asia encompassing developed, developing, emerging markets and least developed countries. So, it was a mix which gave an opportunity to the members to exchange their expertise in different fields whether manufacturing or capacity-building or training. It gave them a tremendous degree of opportunity. This included energy, environment, climate change and sustainable development, financial cooperation, natural disaster mitigation, education and most importantly a Track II study on a Comprehensive Economic Partnership in East Asia. It is called the CEPEA. Till recently, CEPEA was on a Track II where mostly think tanks and representatives including economic experts were examining how to facilitate and expand trade among the East Asia Summit countries. When the Economic Ministers of the East Asia Summit countries met in Bangkok in August, they decided to enhance the activity of CEPEA from the so-called Track II to Track I in the sense that senior officials of the respective Governments would now meet to discuss how to take this forward.

44. At the end of the two Summits, the Prime Minister expressed his satisfaction with their outcome. He said he found a strong desire among the ASEAN countries to substantially strengthen their links with India in all areas. This included not only economic cooperation and trade but also science and technology, human resource development, protection of the environment, and deeper political and security cooperation.

45. The East Asia Summit shared India's vision of an Asian Economic Community that was based on an open and inclusive regional architecture. The EAS countries recognize the impact of India's socio-economic transformation on the reshaping of the global economic order and the opportunities for accelerating Asia's own growth. The Prime Minister reiterated to the leaders of the EAS India's commitment to the success of international efforts to combat climate change, the urgent need to collaborate in the research and development of renewable energy technologies, the need for Asia to focus on food and energy security and disaster management, all of which were key to finding a path to sustainable development. There was understanding among the leaders of the EAS that the issues of terrorism and non-traditional threats to security needed to be addressed with resolve and firmness.

46. To New Delhi's satisfaction the EAS Leaders' endorsed the Nalanda University Project to be located in Bihar.

BIMSTEC

47. The External Affairs Minister described India's commitment to BIMSTEC as an integral part of our "Look East Policy". BIMSTEC with a population of 1.4 billion and GDP of US $ 1.7 trillion is a bridge between India and Southeast Asia. India had hosted the second BIMSTEC Summit in November 2008. There are 14 areas of cooperation identified under the BIMSTEC, some of which are health, energy, technology, HRD, trade, tourism, and counter terrorism. A Free Trade Agreement between India and the countries of the BIMSTEC is under active discussion.

48. While attending the Ministerial meeting of the BIMSTEC in Myanmar in December 2009 India handed over to Myanmar the Chairmanship of the organization. The Ministerial meeting adopted a Convention on Cooperation in Combating International Terrorism, Transnational Organized Crime and Illicit Drug Trafficking, a Memorandum of Association among the Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-sectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation for the establishment of Energy Centre, another Memorandum of Association for a BIMSTEC Centre for Weather and Climate and a Memorandum of Understanding on the Establishment of the BIMSTEC Cultural Industries Commission (BCIC) and BIMSTEC Cultural Industries Observatory (BCIO). The meeting expressed its satisfaction at the finalization of the text of the Agreement on Trade in Goods and other provisions relating to the Rules of Origin, Operational Certification Procedures and the Agreement on Customs Cooperation at the 18th Meeting of the BIMSTEC TNC at Phuket in June 2009, and called upon the TNC to finalize the Annexes to the BIMSTEC FTA Agreement on Trade in Goods at the earliest.

BRIC, SCO and RIC

of the SCO and insisted that the rules for this be finalized soonest to facilitate New Delhi's entry. New Delhi's own decision to participate in the Conference was India's desire to intensify its engagement with countries in its extended neighbourhood in Central Asia. The issues which connect India with the countries of the SCO were, as Prime Minister Manmohan Singh enumerated in his departure statement on June 15,-- "fight against terrorism and extremism, and cooperation in areas of energy security, infrastructure development, agriculture, transportation, science, and technology and education".

50. The SCO Summit was preceded by the Summit of the BRIC countries namely, Brazil, Russia, India, China. Representing 40 percent of the world's population and global GDP, BRIC has the potential to lead global economic growth.

51. The Summit while endorsing the decisions of the G-20 as a panacea for the economic meltdown of 2008, emphasized that the decision-making and implementation process at the international financial organizations should be "democratic and transparent". Even otherwise the Summit underlined its support for a "more democratic and just multi-polar world order based on the rule of international law, equality, mutual respect, cooperation, coordinated action and collective decision-making of all states."

52. India's main concern, terrorism received due attention at the Summit and this was reflected in the joint statement issued at the end of the conference. The Statement inter alia said: "We strongly condemn terrorism in all its forms and manifestations and reiterate that there can be no justification for any act of terrorism anywhere or for whatever reasons. We note that the draft Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism is currently under the consideration of the UN General Assembly and call for its urgent adoption."

53. There was some commonality between the BRIC and SCO Summits held together. The resolve to reform the United Nations Security Council to reflect the contemporary reality, the SCO summit said that global "multi-polarity is irreversible" while the BRIC summit reaffirmed its "support for a more democratic and just multi-polar world order based on the rule of international law, equality, mutual respect, cooperation, coordinated action and collective decision-making of all states."

54. The 9th meeting of the Foreign Minister of the three of the four BRIC countries namely Russia, India and China (RIC) held on 27 October 2009 in Bengaluru (India) while exploring new avenues for deepening and strengthening their interaction on various issues, expressed satisfaction that despite the international financial crisis, their "economies improved contributing to faster growth among them". They were satisfied that "enhanced engagement among them had strengthened their influence on the process of democratization of international relations and development of multi-polar world order reflecting the diversity of world cultures and civilizations". The RIC too endorsed the Pittsburg Conference of G-20 decisions as a way out of the financial crisis of 2008. Like the BRIC and SCO the RIC too "reiterated that there was a need for a comprehensive reform of the United Nations with a view to make it more efficient so that it can deal with the current global challenges more effectively". Juxtaposing the expression that "their countries attach importance to the status of India in international affairs, and understand and support India's aspirations to play a greater role in the United Nations" along with the need for democratizing the UN was quite satisfying to New Delhi. India's concern on the question of terrorism too found resonance in the joint communiqué issued at the end of the Bengaluru Conference.

Commonwealth

55. The theme for this year's Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM) which took place at Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago in November, marking its 60th anniversary, was "Partnering for a more Equitable and Sustainable Future". The Concept paper circulated by the host country Trinidad and Tobago entitled "Partnering for a more Equitable and Sustainable Future" urged member states to forge partnerships for a more sustainable future. India while fully supporting sustainable development and understanding the concerns of Small Island States regarding global warming, however believed that the historical responsibility of the current situation had to be addressed under the principle of Common but Differentiated Responsibilities.

56. At this conference Pakistan was reinstated in the Organization following the "conduct of credible elections in the country in February 2008 and the assumption of office by an elected, civilian government in April 2008".

57. Given the importance of Climate Change, a separate session of the Conference, attended by special invitees like the Secretary General of the UN, the President of France and the Prime Minister of Denmark was held along with the main conference. Since a global climate change solution was central to the survival of peoples, the conference in its declaration on Climate Change pledged itself to the "promotion of development and facilitation of a global transition to a low emission development path" and determined that the agreement in Copenhagen must address the urgent needs of developing countries by providing financing, support for adaptation, technology transfer, capacity building, approaches and incentives for reducing emissions from deforestation and forest degradation, and for afforestation and sustainable management of forests".

XXVIII

58. To mark this special occasion of the 60th anniversary of the Commonwealth, the Indian Prime Minister announced at the conference several new initiatives like issuing commemorative coins and first day covers and stamps, 250 slots under ITEC programme for Commonwealth countries, funding of the post of Sports Advisor in the Commonwealth Secretariat, a special programme of training for Commonwealth diplomats at its Foreign Service Institute, etc.

European Union

59. The 10th India - European Union Summit was held in New Delhi, when the current President of the EU the Swedish Prime Minister Reinfeldt visited New Delhi in November. An important outcome of this annual exercise was the signing of the India-EU Agreement in the field of Fusion Energy Research, which underscored the growing importance of energy security and clean energy in the India-EU cooperation.

60. A review of the progress on the Joint Action Plan adopted in 2005 was conducted, and measures to speed up its implementation were agreed upon. It was noted with satisfaction that despite the economic slowdown, trade in goods and services doubled over the past five- year period to reach almost Euro 80 billion. It was agreed to expedite the conclusion of a balanced and mutually beneficial Broad Based Agreement on Trade and Investment leading, hopefully, to increased economic opportunities and creation of jobs as well as wealth.

61. The Summit provided an opportunity to exchange views on global and regional issues such as the reforms of international institutions, the global economic and financial crisis, climate change and nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation.

62. The security situation in the AF-Pak region which was the cause for concern to both India and the EU was discussed. It was agreed on the need for concerted international action to combat terrorism. India and the EU agreed to work towards early finalization of the agreement between EUROPOL and India. It was also an opportunity to review the situation in West Asia, Iran, Myanmar, Sri Lanka and to discuss other regional issues.

63. The Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his media interaction expressed his satisfaction with the outcome of the discussions and expressed the desire to take this very important relationship forward in all areas.

64. The summit reflected the growing interdependence across a wide range of issues and areas. It was noteworthy that starting with the first bilateral summit in Lisbon in 2000, the EU -India interaction has become multifold. Within 4 years, at The Hague summit, the landmark Strategic Partnership Agreement was signed and in 2005 a Joint Action Plan (JAP) was adopted which gave the roadmap for action, and continues to guide the deliberations annually. With the geopolitical centre progressively shifting, the EU-India relationship steadily moved from commercial and economic one to that of strategic partnership through trade and investment.

G- 8/G-5

65. In July the Prime Minister attended for the fifth time the Summit of the G - 8 countries at L'Aquila, Italy, as a member of the Other Five namely, Brazil, China, Mexico, India and South Africa. This offered an opportunity to the Prime Minister to interact with leaders of both the major and emerging economies. The issues discussed at such meetings varied according to the need of the time. As Prime Minister said in his departure message "this will be an occasion for projecting India's views on major global issues relating to the world economic and financial crisis and its impact on development, food security, energy security and climate change, international trade negotiations and reform of the international institutions".

66. The Prime Minister during his stay in L'Aquila attended meetings of leaders of the G-5, G-5 + G-8 and Egypt and of the G-8, G-5, Egypt and African countries, besides attending the meeting of the Major Economies Forum on Trade and Climate Change. These meetings he told the media accompanying him on board his special flight to New Delhi, took place "when the world is attempting a recovery from the recession caused by the financial crisis in the heart of the developed world". He said while there were some signs of recovery, the world economy was still a long way from recovering the earlier growth momentum. Other subjects that came up were climate change, food security, energy security, terrorism, nuclear non-proliferation, international trade, restructuring of institutions of global governance including the UNSC. While at L'Aquila, he took the opportunity to meet the leaders of Angola, Japan, the USA, Russia, the UK, Australia, Italy, and several other world leaders.

67. When asked if he succeeded in achieving what he had set to achieve, he frankly said "This is a big struggle. I have placed the thinking of India before the G-8, G-5 and before the entire world. I believe there has been a great appreciation of our view point. But it would not be correct to say that all other countries are in agreement with us. Particularly there is going to be greater pressure on India and China. We have to stop it. Alongside we have to make the world understand that as global citizen we understand the responsibilities of India. What is reasonable to stem the climate change we shall do and in fact we are doing."

68. The Conference ended with the adoption of several declarations such as, on food security, counter terrorism, non-proliferation, global agenda, and declaration by the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate Change.

69. Regarding the financial crisis, the Prime Minister told the Parliament on July 17 that he had stressed to the Conference the "importance of a concerted and well coordinated global response to address systemic failures and to stimulate the real economy. There is a need to maintain adequate flow of finance to the developing countries and to keep markets open by resisting protectionist pressures".

70. As pointed out in earlier paras there was some apprehension in India about the G-8 Statement on non-proliferation and its impact on India's cooperation on civil nuclear energy agreements with countries like the United States, France and Russia. Prime Minister took pains to assure the people of India through his statement in Parliament on July 29 that their apprehensions were misplaced. While pointing out that India's agreements were with some of the individual countries of the G-8 who had again pledged to stay committed to the agreements and not with the G-8 per se. Besides, in view of the clean exemption accorded to India by the NSG last year on nuclear trade, India had nothing to fear.

G-20

71. The impact of financial crisis which gripped the world in 2008 continued to be felt in 2009. The world leaders met twice in summit at London in April and at Pittsburg in September. The London Conference meeting in April was confronted with the greatest challenge to the world economy in recent times. The global output was contracting at pace not seen since the 1930s. Trade was plummeting. Jobs were disappearing rapidly. It appeared as if the world was on the edge of a depression.

72. The London Conference met the challenge head on and many agreements were arrived at which helped the global economy to stage some fast recovery. There was agreement that credit flows to developing countries must be restored. There was consensus that the development process particularly of the developing countries could not be halted and this realization resulted in ambitious liquidity stimulus measure and growth packages. Importantly the Conference pledged to mobilize US $ 1.1 trillion of resources for international financial institutions, largely to sustain growth in emerging markets. The steps taken by the G-20 to augment the resources of multilateral development banks led to substantial stepping up of World Bank lending to emerging economies and India benefited too. This summit too agreed the crisis was tackled in a way that did not create other problems for the future like protectionism or restrictions on the free flow of trade and persons that could be counter productive for the developing countries in the long and short run. Similarly there was consensus that development could not be halted or sacrificed in the search for immediate solutions to the financial crisis.

73. By the time Pittsburg Conference convened in September the global economy and financial markets had shown a distinct improvement. The positive results flowing from the London Conference were acknowledged by the Pittsburg in its Communique issued on September 25. It noted: "Our forceful response helped stop the dangerous, sharp decline in global activity and stabilize financial markets. Industrial output is now rising in nearly all our economies. International trade is starting to recover. Our financial institutions are raising needed capital, financial markets are showing a willingness to invest and lend, and confidence has improved..... Our national commitments to restore growth resulted in the largest and most coordinated fiscal and monetary stimulus ever undertaken. We acted together to increase dramatically the resources necessary to stop the crisis from spreading around the world. We took steps to fix the broken regulatory system and started to implement sweeping reforms to reduce the risk that financial excesses will again destabilize the global economy."

74. The Pittsburg Summit was meant essentially to review what had happened since the London Conference and chart the way forward in the light of experience gained. The Conference agreed there would be no premature withdrawal of stimulus. The conference noted that the emergency financing for the International Monetary Fund had been successfully completed and there was now need to address the issue of the IMF quota increase by early 2011. There was agreement to help the World Bank and other regional development banks to find the necessary resources based on a review of their capital needs to be completed in the first half of 2010.

75. An important decision of the Conference was to phase out and rationalize the medium term inefficient fossil fuel subsidies while providing targeted support for the poorest. There was a recognition that inefficient fossil fuel subsidies encourage wasteful consumption, reduce energy security, impede investment in clean energy sources and undermine efforts to deal with the threat of climate change.

76. The most important conclusion of the Pittsburgh Conference was that the Group of 20 will henceforth be the premier forum for international economic issues. This is an important development to broadening the global governance structure, to incorporate major developing and emerging countries into the new framework. There was speculation that this decision could lead to merger of the role of G-8 with that of G-20.

77. The Pittsburgh Conference pledged to sustain strong policy responses until a durable recovery was secured and to avoid any premature withdrawal of stimulus while preparing exit strategies and adopt policies needed to lay the foundation for strong, sustained and balanced growth in the 21st century. As stated above the London Conference had laid emphasis on avoiding a solution that would create other problems for the future like protectionism or restrictions on the free flow of trade and persons. At Pittsburgh that danger was recognized once again and it was pledged that "We will fight protectionism. We are committed to bringing the Doha Round to a successful conclusion in 2010."

78. To achieve the objective of the Conference, it launched a Framework for Strong, Sustainable, and Balanced Growth and tasked the IMF to help "with its analysis of how our respective national or regional policy frameworks fit together." It identified the World Bank for advice "on progress in promoting development and poverty reduction as part of the rebalancing of global growth". While doing so the Conference pledged to "work together to ensure that our fiscal, monetary, trade, and structural policies are collectively consistent with more sustainable and balanced trajectories of growth".

79. To undertake the work of putting the Framework in place the Finance Ministers and Governors of Central Bank of the G-20 were tasked "to launch the new Framework by November by initiating a cooperative process of mutual assessment of our policy frameworks and the implications of those frameworks for the pattern and sustainability of global growth".

80. Accordingly the Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors of the G-20 met in November and launched "the G20 Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth". They adopted "a detailed timetable and initiated a new consultative mutual assessment process to evaluate" whether their policies will collectively deliver the "agreed objectives". The IMF and the World Bank were called upon to assist in this task, beside getting input from other international organizations "as appropriate including FSB, OECD, MDBs, ILO, WTO and UNCTAD".

Nonaligned Summit

81. The XV Summit of the nonaligned countries was held in Sharm EL-Sheikh (Egypt) in July. It had for its main agenda the theme of "International Solidarity for Peace and Development" and the current Economic and Financial Crisis. Non-alignment has been the bedrock and an article of faith of India's foreign policy. Talking of the relevance of the nonaligned movement "in the post-Cold War era, when the world is no longer divided into two military blocs", the Prime Minister said in his departure statement it "has a renewed role to play in the emerging world order". He pledged to the members of the NAM that "India will play its part in helping NAM to regain its moral high ground to address issues which are of direct concern and relevance to developing countries such as sustainable development, climate change, food security, energy security, terrorism and reform of the architecture of international governance".

82. Stressing the need for solidarity among the countries of the movement, External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on July 15 addressing the Ministerial segment of the Conference said "Our solidarity is crucial for our development and progress. Our problems are common. They range from poverty alleviation, eradicating hunger and deprivation, tackling pandemics, and raising literacy levels. Our responses to them are naturally varied given our differing situations. Many of them need international cooperation and an enabling environment for countries to succeed in these tasks. Solidarity within our Movement and a balanced approach should be our guiding principles."

83. "Nowhere is international solidarity for peace and development most relevant than in combating terrorism," said Mr. Krishna. He did not stop at that and went on to underline its scourge to humanity and warned: "Terrorism threatens democracy and democratic values. It aims to destroy lives and reverse development. It is also a threat to international peace and security. International solidarity and solidarity within NAM are necessary in order to combat this scourge effectively. We call upon MAM members to unequivocally condemn terrorism; no cause or reasoning can be used to justify such acts. In this context, the early adoption of the Comprehensive Convention on Terrorism being discussed in the United Nations is an immediate imperative."

84. Pointing out the relevance of nonalignment, the Prime Minister in his address to the Summit plenary on July 15, alluded to the unfairness of the system as presently structured both in terms of political and economic institutions. He said while the financial crisis had been brought upon the world by the developed economies, greater burden of it has been unfairly cast on the developing countries which were also non-aligned. Therefore nonaligned movement had a great stake in securing the steps planned to revive the global economy. These include the challenges of food security, energy security, environment and reform of the institutions of global governance. They were embedded in the economic crisis and must be dealt with comprehensively and with a sense of urgency. The Prime Minister regretted that though "we have a global economy of sorts, the global polity does not represent the hopes, fears and aspirations of the majority of the world's people". Regretfully the "decision-making processes, whether in the United Nations or the international financial institutions continue to be based on charters written more than sixty years ago, though the world has changed greatly since then", said the Prime Minister. Prime Minister pleaded that the weight of NAM should be used to achieve a comprehensive, balanced and above all, equitable solution to the economic and political problems of the world.

85. The Sharm El Sheikh Declaration issued on July 16 inter alia demanded the expeditious reform of the Security Council through its expansion and improvement of its working methods; the fundamental reform of the international economic and financial systems and architecture "so as to address its flaws". It asked for enhanced voice and participation of developing countries "in international economic and decision making and norm setting, including in international financial institutions, with a central role of the United Nations and its member states through the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, including in mitigating the impact of the crises on developing countries and in materializing the right of developing countries to a legitimate policy space."

86. The Sharm El Sheikh Summit ended with four declarations- Declaration on Palestine, Declaration on ending US embargo on Cuba, the Final Declaration and the Sharm El Sheikh Declaration.

V

South Asia -- The Countries of the SAARC

87. South Asia or the countries of the SAARC represent one-fifth of humanity. It is an enormous landmass. Bonds of geography, history, culture and values tie the peoples of this region together. For centuries, South Asia has been the home for the peaceful coexistence of various peoples in harmony with nature. People of many faiths have lived together for ages and our region has given birth to many religions-- Hinduism, Buddhism, Sikhism and Jainism. Islam enriched the mosaic of South Asian culture for more than millennia. There were practicing Christians on the Malabar coast before Christianity reached Europe.

88. All through the region, efforts were underway to achieve the common good through greater exchanges at multiple levels - governmental, parliamentary, academic, cultural and most importantly at the level of peoples through the promotion of tourism, commerce and cooperation in the field of education. These efforts have to be accelerated for the region to confront its common challenges - poverty alleviation, health, education and industrialization. Internal stability and economic progress in all the region could only solve the problem of poverty which has been endemic for centuries. It is only through shared economic development that the region can achieve its objectives of lasting peace and security. Growth and development are closely intertwined with peace and security.

Afghanistan

89. India's $ 1.2 billion assistance programme in Afghanistan, makes it the sixth largest donor and underlines its abiding interest in the political stability of the country by strengthening its social and economic institutions to guarantee its self-sustained growth. The Indian programme straddles the road and power projects, small and quick-gestation social projects and indigenous skills and capacity development. India's five medical missions provide free medicines and treatment to over a thousand patients a day. The Indian-aided Indira Gandhi Hospital has now been linked through a telemedicine link with two of India's super specialty hospitals, similar to what India has done for the African countries

90. In 2009 India-assisted 218-KM long Zaranj - Delaram Road, Pul-e-Khumri transmission lines and the substation at Chimtala were inaugurated. The Shimtala sub-station ensures stable 24-hour supply of power to the capital city of Kabul. The Salma Dam on the Hari Rud river in Heart province and the Afghan parliament building are scheduled to be completed in 2011. Human resource development is an important element of Indian programme in Afghanistan. In this sector India provides annually 675 scholarships each, for undergraduate and graduate studies in India, besides training facilities for public servants in Indian training institutions in areas beneficial to that country. India welcomed the successful completion of second presidential and provincial elections, which marked the maturing of democratic institutions in a traditional society.

91. The set back in the security scenario was indeed a major cause for worry. There was a repeat attack on the Indian Embassy in Kabul. The targeting of the Indian Embassy in Kabul on October 8 by a suicide squad of the Taliban, shocked New Delhi. It may be recalled that on July 7, 2008 there was a similar attack on the Embassy, in which 40 people including two senior diplomats-a military attaché and a Counsellor besides security personnel of the Embassy and Afghan nationals were killed. The present suicide attack killed 17 people and injured another 80. Characterizing the attack on the Indian mission in Kabul as the handiwork of those desperate to undermine Indo-Afghan friendship, New Delhi offered financial and medical assistance to Afghan nationals injured in the terror strike. While India did not point an accusing finger at any one, the Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao said "whoever is responsible for this attack is against peace, is against democracy, is against people of Afghanistan and against the people of India." The Afghan authorities however, had apparently no doubt about the direction the attack came and said that it was planned from "across the border." Refusing to be intimidated by such clumsy attacks Ms. Rao reiterated New Delhi's "unwavering commitment to pursue our bilateral development partnership and assist the people of Afghanistan in realising a democratic, peaceful and prosperous Afghanistan." The External Affairs Minister asked to comment on the developments in Kabul, reiterated in Bengaluru on October 10 India's "determination to continue its work of developing infrastructure there".

92. The irony is that only a day earlier on October 7, Foreign Secretary Mrs. Rao at a Seminar in New Delhi prophetically had warned of the "recent dramatic decline in security", and the "need for an intensified focus on security, governance and development." She called upon the international community to "do what it can to assist" Afghanistan, and to put "effective pressure on Pakistan to implement its stated commitment to deal with terrorist groups in its territory including the members of the Al Qaeda." She cautioned "failure in Afghanistan's stabilisation will entail a heavy cost for both the Afghan people and the world at large". Mrs. Rao was quite forthright in analyzing the reasons for the decline in the security scenario and the source of turbulence, when she said: "the increase in terrorist actions in Afghanistan is linked to the support and sanctuaries available in the contiguous areas. That explains the particularly high-level of violence in the border areas of Afghanistan". Mrs. Rao warned that unless security was ensured "the gains made over the past eight years will be compromised and it will become difficult to forestall the restoration of status-quo-ante, to a situation similar to what prevailed prior to 11 September 2001." Underlining Indian conviction that "terrorism cannot be compartmentalized" she warned that "any facile attempts to strike Faustian bargains with terrorists often result in such forces turning on the very powers that sustained them in the past." She had no qualms in pointing out the "sense of defeatism (that) pervades certain sections of international opinion" and the need to guard against this, "because it runs the risk of encouraging insurgent groups, besides weakening the authority of the Central Government and its institutions". In sounding her warning, she had on the back of her mind the recent rumbling of the call for differentiating between good and bad Talibans; bring the former in the mainstream by sharing power with them and in the process isolating the latter. The question which bothered New Delhi was 'can the out laws of so many years' standing--some accused of most barbarous crimes, really be given a share in running the country? New Delhi continued to be disbelieving. However it is a losing battle India is fighting. The NATO powers have put their weight behind it. Afghan President Hamid Karzai with Pakistan's enthusiastic backing is sold to the idea, New Delhi's options are limited.

93. In March 2009 India had welcomed the US Af-Pak policy in the hope that it augured well for the security of Afghanistan since the strategy started with a clear, concise, attainable goal: disrupt, dismantle, and defeat al Qaeda and its safe havens. For the first time Afghanistan and Pakistan were clubbed together as two countries but one challenge. Despite western efforts and deployment, the security situation however remained fragile and there was not much decline in terrorist activity. It looked as if the security forces both internal and external were not in a position to meet the challenge and there was a danger of their getting bogged down in the Afghan quagmire. Then in a dramatic move on December 1, 2009 President Obama announced surge of another 30, 000 troops in Afghanistan to augment the American deployment to bring the situation under control expeditiously. But President Obama's brave announcement too had a dampening ring about it. He announced the timetable for starting the American pull out of its troops from that country in the next 18 months. While New Delhi welcomed the "surge" as a step to strengthen the Afghan security forces to meet the challenge of terrorism in that country and President Obama's call on Pakistan to ensure "terrorists do not enjoy safe havens on its territory", New Delhi knew well that the hope was too fanciful. If past experience was any guide Pakistan was indeed a weak link who in search for its "strategic depth" played a different ball game from the one the US had in mind. Therefore while welcoming US surge New Delhi, harbouring its doubts of Pakistan's bona fide, appealed the international community "to impress upon Pakistan that it must use all its influence and resources to implement its commitments to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism and to deny sanctuary to all terrorist groups who operate from its soil". New Delhi too was not sanguine on the time table the US set for it to begin withdrawing from Afghanistan. The Official Spokesperson of the Indian Ministry of External Affairs on December 3 gave expression to his doubts when he said that it was "imperative that the international community shows sustained and long-term commitment to assisting the Government and people of Afghanistan."

Bangladesh

94. As a result of the landslide victory of the Awami League in the December 2008 elections, Sheikh Hasina took over as Prime Minister of Bangladesh on January 7, 2009. India welcomed the new government and the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his message of congratulations to Sheikh Hasina assured her that he looked forward to working closely with her to further strengthen and expand the multifaceted bilateral relationship in a manner that responded to the aspirations of the people of the two countries.

95. In February the External Affairs Minister visited Bangladesh and received the most positive response to New Delhi's concerns on the question of security. Bangladesh's Foreign Minister Ms. Moni's words were most reassuring. She said Dhaka believed that "the terrorists don't have any borders, they don't have any religion, they don't have any nationality. They are terrorists. Whoever tries to use our territory to harm anyone we will put a stop to it. We will be vigilant. We are reassuring not just the honourable Foreign Minister of India but like to reassure all of us that we will be vigilant and we will not let anyone use our territories for any kind of terrorist activities." During his call on Prime Minister Hasina, Mr. Mukherjee proposed a Task Force to combat terrorism. Adding her bit Ms. Moni said Bangladesh would have dialogues with its other regional neighbours", since "terrorism is a problem, which is not contained by any borders, so combating terrorism also needs cross-border regional cooperation to be effective". All this was most reassuring to New Delhi.

96. Bangladesh's trade deficit with India had been a matter of concern to Dhaka for a long time. Though India had been responsive to Dhaka's concern, latter failed to understand that it was not always possible to address this problem in arithmetic terms. Showing understanding of Bangladesh's concern on this account EAM tried to argue that while imbalance may not be possible to eliminate, it certainly was "possible to reduce the gap and to keep it within manageable limits." Recalling his last visit to Dhaka he reminded Dhaka that New Delhi had removed or reduced tariff barriers on a number of items. Reassuring Dhaka of India bonafide he said: "This time, during my interaction with the Foreign Minister I have requested them to give me a list in which Bangladesh Government is interested so that we can further prune the negative list. We have already pruned the negative list. In this connection you may recall, unilaterally, we declared at the 14th SAARC Summit - India will allow large number of items without any duty from the least developed countries, including Bangladesh".

97. During the EAM visit two Agreements - one on bilateral trade and the other on bilateral investment promotion and protection were signed in the hope that these would further strengthen the framework for trade and investment between both countries. To further promote trade between closes neighbours External Affairs Minister stressed the importance "to enhance connectivity, linkages" which would bring prosperity to the region. The subject of connectivity was again a subject of discussion in September when Bangladesh Foreign Minister paid a return visit to New Delhi. It was then agreed that the Indian side would facilitate Nepal-Bangladesh and Bhutan-Bangladesh connectivity.

98. The September visit of Dr. Moni was important for both the countries from many angles. It was supposed to be a curtain raiser for the scheduled visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina before the end of 2009. Since both the Prime Ministers of India and Bangladesh had to make unscheduled visits to Copenhagen for the Climate Change Summit, her visit was postponed and it took place in January 2010.

99. Among the many important decisions taken during Dr. Moni's visit, the most momentous decision of far reaching importance was to enhance cooperation in the power sector. India agreed to provide at least 100 MW of power to Bangladesh on a priority basis. Dhaka had expressed concern at the Tipaimukh Dam project on Brahmaputra, but New Delhi to allay Dhaka's misgivings assured it that India "would not take steps that would adversely impact Bangladesh". Similarly to resolve the long pending question of sharing of waters of the Teesta river, while mandating the two foreign offices to urgently discuss the technical and other parameters of this issue, it was agreed to immediately commence joint hydrological observations on the river and undertake bank protection works.

100. The visit of Dr. Moni provided an opportunity to give shape to the concerns expressed by both for their mutual security during the External Affairs' visit to Dhaka in February. It was now agreed to conclude two important agreements --Agreement for Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters, and Agreement on Combating International Terrorism, Organized Crime and Illegal Drug Trafficking. It was also agreed to conclude another agreement for transfer of sentenced persons in each other's country.

Nepal

101. In May the Nepalese government led by the Maoist leader Pushpa Kamal Dahal "Parchanda" resigned on issue of civil control over armed forces, since the Cabinet decision to replace the Chief of Army Staff was not accepted by President Dr. Ram Baran Yadav. In the ensuing developments a new coalition government under CPN (UML) leader Madhav Kumar Nepal and supported by 22 parties, took office. Political instability in the neighbourhood of India did cause unease in New Delhi. The Prime Minister giving his expression to his anxiety on this account said on May 4 "Today there is lack of peace and stability in India's neighbouring nations- be it Nepal, Pakistan or Sri Lanka. It [the developments] can also affect the security situation in our country." The Union Home Ministry directed Seema Suraksha Bal (SSB) which patrols 1750-km border with Nepal, to remain on high alert.

102. The fast developing scenario in Kathmandu saw Foreign Secretary Shiv Shankar Menon in Kathmandu on June 20-21 to reiterate India's commitment to "assist Nepal in its transition to multi-party democracy and in its peace process to achieve a peaceful and prosperous future".

103. India was concerned at the stalemate in constitution making and lack of political consensus in Nepal. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna told the Lok Sabha on July 9 that due to the nature of our "relations and the open border, the developments in Nepal had a direct impact on us". Of particular concern to New Delhi was lack of tangible progress in the process of integration and rehabilitation of the combatants of the Maoist army and their cadres. As the year ended the process of constitution making too remained stalemated, essentially due to disagreement among the political parties on the structure of governance and polity.

104. In August both the Nepalese Prime Minister and the Prime Minister visited New Delhi separately. The visit of Prime Minister Madhav Kumar 'Nepal' offered an opportunity to discuss and resolve many outstanding issues relating to trade, and transit, borders and border management, cross border crime, connectivity, hydro-power and water management, development assistance, supply of essential commodities, infrastructure, education and human resource development, investments etc. The Prime Minister of India assured his Nepalese counterpart India's full support and cooperation in its political process and constitution making. The longstanding Nepalese urge for revision of the 1950 Treaty was discussed and the two Foreign Secretaries were directed "to discuss and review the 1950 Treaty of Peace and Friendship and other bilateral agreements with a view to further strengthening the bilateral relationship".

105. Security has remained a major area of concern between the two countries. The Nepalese side assured New Delhi that it would not allow its territory to be used for any activity against India and the Indian side also gave the same assurance to the Nepalese side. The two sides agreed to consider steps to further facilitate cross-border arrangements in order to resolve border related issues and to assist local populations in the border areas on both sides. They also stressed on the need for strengthening the legal framework, in order to counter their common cross border security challenges. Unfortunately the extradition treaty which was initialed in January 2005 has remained unsigned for one reason or the other.

106. Following the Nepalese Prime Minister's visit, the Indian Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao visited Kathmandu in September to exchange views on further improvement of bilateral relations and to focus on the implementation of the vast agenda agreed upon during the visit of the Prime Minister of Nepal, as contained in the Joint Press Statement. At the Civil Aviation Secretary level talks both sides agreed to promote tourism between the two countries by increasing the number of seats from 6000 to 30, 000 between Kathmandu and the Indian metros.

107. It may be recalled that the appointment of Indian priests to perform the traditional puja at the sacred shrine of Lord Pashupatinath in Kathmandu had created some avoidable trouble by some elements for which the political leaders, with whom Mrs. Rao interacted, conveyed their regret. The Government of Nepal reassured her that "they have taken all necessary measures to ensure the security and well being of the Indian priests and continuation of regular prayers at the temple".

XLII

108. Mrs. Rao reinforced Prime Minister's assurance to the Nepalese political leaders India's "abiding interest in the success of Nepal's transition to multi-party democracy and the completion of the peace process" since a peaceful, democratic and prosperous Nepal was in the interest of the both countries and their people and South Asia.

109. In October the two countries signed the Treaty of Trade and the Agreement of Cooperation to Control Unauthorized Trade. The new Trade Treaty revised the 1996 Treaty which was a turning point in the trade relations between the two countries and resulted in phenomenal growth of bilateral trade from Rs. 28.1 billion in 1995-96 to Rs. 204.8 billion in 2008-09. While the Nepalese exports to India increased from Rs. 3.7 billion to Rs. 40.9 billion, the Indian exports to Nepal increased from Rs. 24.4 billion to Rs. 163.9 billion during the period 1995- 2009. Yet the two sides felt there was a need to shift the Indo-Nepal trade to the higher level and attain better qualitative dimensions.

110. A fundamental feature of the 2009 Agreement of Cooperation to Control Unauthorized Trade was to allow export of goods imported by Nepal from India to the third countries without necessity of carrying out any manufacturing activity in Nepal. This would enhance exports from Nepal to third countries where it had a better market access as compared to India. Similarly it will allow export of the goods imported by India from Nepal to third countries. This will help Nepalese exporters to take advantage of the third country market access developed by the Indian export houses.

Sri Lanka

111. It was a decisive year in Sri Lanka's history. The Sri Lankan security forces for the first time took the battle in the LTTE's territory and beat them too. New Delhi was anguished that political structure of talks was abundant in favour of a solution by use of arms. It repeatedly impressed on Colombo to work for a political solution through peaceful negotiations between all the parties. It appealed to the LTTE too to abandon the path of armed conflict, lay down arms and sit across the table with the Sri Lanka Government to find a political solution. Unfortunately that was not to be. LTTE's obstinacy and obduracy shrank the ground for New Delhi to help in a peaceful political solution. The conflict resulted in large scale suffering for the people in the North province, which bore the brunt of the fighting. About three lakh Tamils were displaced from their homes and hearths, many were killed and many more injured in the cross fire.

112. The killing of LTTE Chief Villupalli Prabhakaran during the security operations and the defeat of the LTTE though eliminated the militarist fringe of the Tamils; it did not bring a political solution to the ethnic issue any closer. A permanent solution admittedly may take a little time. The priority was to heal the wounds inflicted by decades of protracted conflict, to make a new beginning and to build a better future for the people. The External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on December 4 in his speech in the Parliament emphasized to the Sri Lankan Government that "the time had indeed come to focus on issues of relief, rehabilitation, resettlement and reconciliation". India while expressing its readiness to work with the Government of Sri Lanka in the rehabilitation and reconstruction process of Northern Sri Lanka and in restoring normalcy offered an assistance of Rs. 1000 crores.

113. Presence of nearly 300,000 Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) in camps in Northern Sri Lanka posed a major challenge to the Sri Lankan Government. The need was immediate humanitarian attention and urgent steps to resettle them in their original places of habitation so as to restore semblance of normalcy in their lives after the traumatic experience they had undergone.

114. Sri Lanka Government had announced that by the end of 2009 a couple of lakh displaced persons would be settled. By all accounts Sri Lanka government did struggle to achieve the rehabilitation and humanitarian objectives of the problem on an expeditious scale. By the end of the year about a couple of lakh IDPs had indeed been settled.

115. In October, a delegation of Tamil Parliament Members visited Sri Lanka to see things for themselves. They witnessed the distribution of the humanitarian relief items donated by India and held discussions with a cross-section of the leaders of the Sri Lankan Tamil community and the Indian Origin Tamils. They called on the President of Sri Lanka Mahinda Rajapaksa. The parliamentarians came back by and large satisfied at the pace of rehabilitation and relief work in Northern Sri Lanka.

116. The Government of India assisted and worked with the Sri Lankan Government to ensure the resettlement of all IDPs. 2.5 lakh family packs from Tamil Nadu, consisting of dry rations, clothing, utensils, footwear etc, were provided to the IDPs. The 60-member emergency field hospital set up by India in March 2009 operated for six months till September and treated more than 50,000 patients, many of them serious cases requiring surgery. Two consignments of medical supplies were also gifted.

XLIV

117. Speaking in the Lok Sabha on December 4, Mr. Krishna assured the Tamil community that besides Rs. 1000 crore already promised, India was committed to doing more. "Our humanitarian effort in Sri Lanka has transitioned from a purely relief effort to a broader rehabilitation and reconstruction phase," announced the External Affairs Minister. To facilitate speedy resettlement of IDPs, India extended much needed de-mining assistance. To ensure that returning IDPs had a roof over their heads, India donated initially 2,600 tonnes of shelter material. An additional 2,600 tonnes of shelter material was again provided. To address the vulnerable sections of the society emerging out of a military conflict, especially war widows, New Delhi undertook to construct a project for their rehabilitation as well.

118. For the rehabilitation of agriculture in the devastated North Province, India supplied 20,000 agricultural starter packs in the first instance followed by an additional 50,000 packs. A team led by the Indian Council of Agricultural Research visited Sri Lanka to work out a blueprint for assistance to revive agriculture there.

119. To help in the priority area of infrastructure under Lines of Credit India committed to take up projects in railway infrastructure, reconstruction in Northern Sri Lanka and provision of rolling stock. India too is anxious to rejuvenate the cultural and social life amongst the people in the North and East provinces. Skill development and capacity building are areas of focus, as also vocational training and the provision of enhanced educational opportunities.

120. But rehabilitation and resettlement was one part of the story; the other and more important was finding a political solution to the ethnic problem within the framework of a united Sri Lanka, which would meet the legitimate interest and aspirations of all sections of the population that caused the conflict and the attendant ruin all round. Revival of such a political process and an inclusive dialogue would help bring the minority communities into the political mainstream and offer a dignified life to all. India continued to emphasise to the Sri Lankan Government to put forward a meaningful devolution package that would go beyond the 13th Amendment. This naturally was expected to take some time. The Government time table is progressing to a schedule. The presidential election, which was advanced by a couple of years, was completed in January 2010 and the incumbent president emerged victorious.

121. There was a need to evolve a national consensus and hold an all party meeting on this crucial issue. One only hopes this process will not be unduly prolonged and meaningful dialogue will be held in a business like manner leading to an all round acceptable solution which will be harbinger of social, economic and political harmony in the island.

Pakistan

122. India-Pakistan relations during the year remained under the 26/11 cloud. New Delhi was anguished that Pakistan had not shown enough earnestness to prosecute the leaders/handlers of the gang who mounted the terror attack on Mumbai. Despite India providing copious evidence to meet the insatiable and repeated Pakistani demands for more and more evidence, Pakistan did not show enough seriousness to put up a cast-iron case in the court, particularly against their ring leader Hafiz Mohammad Saeed. It found space behind the smokescreen provided by the Lahore High Court which threw out the case against him since court felt there was not enough evidence to prosecute him. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in his gentle manner gave vent to Indian frustration when he told Karan Thapar in an interview on June 14 "Pakistan could have made more serious attempts in fighting the case and I believe that not enough was done in pursuing the case".

123. The Jahadi outfits that were declared unlawful were still operating freely, albeit under different names. The Pakistani cities too came under repeated terror attacks resulting in the killing of scores of people. The tiger Islamabad was riding was roaring back for once. But it did not spur Pakistan enough. They continue to have a field day. Unfortunately, Pakistan failed to realize that terrorism is a two-edged sword. The Frankenstein that it allowed to grow in its backyard for years to 'punish' India for its failure to address Islamabad's perceived grievances, including one on Kashmir, had now chosen to strike back, giving Pakistan the taste of its own pudding. Perhaps the cries of the innocent Pakistanis were not loud enough for the deaf Pakistani leadership. It nevertheless remained oblivious of the Indian pain and anguish.

124. Under the US prodding and perhaps in gratitude for massive US financial assistance Pakistan did move a little finger but only selectively. It chose to act against only those operating in its western region targeting western interests. It remained ambivalent on action against those operating on its eastern borders. Never mind if in targeting India they were neither sparing Pakistan's premier cities like Islamabad and Lahore. It perhaps did not matter to Pakistan even when the guest sportsmen were not spared.

125. Complicity of Pakistan in terror attack on the Indian Embassy in Kabul in July 2008 was no less galling for New Delhi. Pakistan, in search of an illusionary strategic depth in the west, employed the instrument of terror to sanitize Afghanistan of Indian presence. The grudging acquiescence of the outside powers, anxious to use Pakistan in securing their larger objective in that country was unfortunate. And this when it was admitted by all that the Indian programmes were beneficial for the people of Afghanistan. Failure of these powers to persuade Pakistan to allow its corridor for the import by Afghanistan of the much needed Indian goods, and allow the export of its produce to India points to that failure.

126. The outraged Indian public opinion backed the government's decision taken last year to suspend the on-going 'Composite Dialogue', until Pakistan took credible action against the people whom India held responsible for the Mumbai attack and against whom sufficient evidence was provided to Islamabad in several dossiers. That India made this a litmus test of Pakistan's sincerity was articulated by the Prime Minister himself on the floor of the Parliament when he said that if Pakistan showed the sincerity that was necessary to convey to us that they were rearing to go the whole hog in trying to destroy the instrumentalities of terrorism, which was directed against India, perhaps India would be too willing to resume the dialogue with Pakistan.

127. During the year India unsuccessfully tested waters several times to see if there was even a glimmer of hope that Pakistan was serious about taking action towards dismantling the structure of terrorism directed against India. At Yekaterinburg, on June 16, on the sidelines of the SCO Summit, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh chose to deliver a tough message to President Zardari. He was left in no doubt about India's seriousness. Mr. Singh told Mr. Zardari in the presence of the media that while he was happy to meet him, his mandate was to tell him "quite frankly that I have come with the limited mandate of discussing how Pakistan can deliver on its assurances that its territory would not be used for terrorist attacks on India." It took not only President Zardari by surprise but the entire media and the public at large. It was India's frustration at Pakistan's pussyfooting on the terrorist question that was oozing out.

128. By the time the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan met at Sharm El Sheikh on the sidelines of the NAM Summit, not much had happened to give India the satisfaction that it was looking for. While Pakistani Prime Minister Yusuf Raza Gilani was anxious for resumption of the composite dialogue, Dr. Manmohan Singh assured him that New Delhi was not against the talks per se, but "the dialogue cannot begin unless and until the terrorist acts of Mumbai are fully accounted for and the perpetrators are brought to book". Pakistan putting a spin of its own on the joint statement interpreted the phrase "Prime Ministers recognized that dialogue is the only way forward. Action on terrorism should not be linked to the Composite Dialogue process and these should not be bracketed." The use of the phrase "Action on terrorism" preceding the words "not linked to the Composite Dialogue process" clearly put the onus of "Action" first on Pakistan which was to be followed by Dialogue and not the other way round as Pakistan sought to interpret.

129. The Prime Minister explained in Parliament on July 29 while speaking on his visits abroad that it was "in our vital interest to make sincere efforts to live in peace with Pakistan. But despite the best of intentions, we cannot move forward if terrorist attacks launched from Pakistani soil continue to kill and injure our citizens, here and abroad. That is the national position. I stand by it. I have said time and again and I repeat it right now again: it is impossible for any government in India to work towards full normalization of relations with Pakistan unless the Government of Pakistan fulfills, in letter and spirit, its commitment not to allow its territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India." This was the sum and substance of what he tried to explain to the Pakistan Prime Minister Gilani notwithstanding what he made out to understand. The truth was ringing loud and clear when Dr. Manmohan Singh added "over the past seven months, we followed a policy, using all effective bilateral and multilateral instruments at our command, to ensure that Pakistan acts, with credibility and sincerity, as we would expect of any civilized nation". In the face of Pakistani intransigence on the question of terrorism, if any body expected that Dr. Singh offered to resume talks or de-link terrorism from the dialogue, it would sound incredulous.

130. The mention of Pakistan's problem area of Balochistan in the Shram El Sheikh Joint Statement created avoidable confusion in a section of the media and the public. The Prime Minister explaining its rationale said that Prime Minister Gilani had expressed to him the apprehensions of a section of the Pakistani people that India "meddled in that Province". But he assured him that their concerns were unfounded since India was "neither interested in destabilizing Pakistan nor it harboured any ill will towards Pakistan". He firmly believed and told Mr. Gilani as well that "a stable, peaceful and prosperous Pakistan living in peace with its neighbours is in our own interest". He reiterated to the Lok Sabha, what he had told Gilani "that we are not afraid of discussing any issue of concern between the two countries. If there are any misgivings, we are willing to discuss them and remove them". He also told Prime Minister Gilani that the Indian Consulates located in Kandhar and Jalalabad, which were there for the past sixty years, had never before been accused of any thing like that since they were only involved in purely diplomatic work. Besides the diplomatic work, the Consulates now were additionally engaged in the reconstruction work in Afghanistan, which was beneficial to the common people of that country. Being sure of the bona fide of the Indian agencies in Afghanistan, the Prime Minister assured Mr. Gilani that if Pakistan had any evidence to the contrary, India would not shy away from looking into that since "we have nothing to hide." Concluding the Prime Minister said that he believed that "it is as much in Pakistan's vital interest as it is in ours to make peace. Pakistan must defeat terrorism, before being consumed by it. I believe the current leadership there understands the need for action." "Our objective" the Prime Minister said, "must be a permanent peace with Pakistan, where we are bound together by a shared future and a common prosperity". Dr. Singh believed that there was a large constituency for peace in both countries and the majority of people in both countries wanted an honourable settlement of the problems between them that had festered far too long and want to set aside the animosities of the past. That was the hope that inspired the Prime Minister to extend the hand of friendship to Pakistan at Sharm El Sheikh despite 26/11.

131. Despite all his efforts not to let Pakistan get off the hook easily and his disappointment, Prime Minister Singh still persisted in his peace efforts, because there was no alternative and said so in his speech: "I say with strength and conviction that dialogue and engagement is the best way forward". That was Prime Minister's commitment to peace because there is no alternative to peace, and peace comes with dialogue and not sitting back and sulking at home. The question is what is the right time for talks? There can be difference of opinion on the timing but not on act of it. To convince the House that there was no alternative to talks and dialogue, the Prime Minister referred to the repeated efforts of his predecessor who despite Hijacking of the IC plane, Kargil, and Parliament attack persisted in dialogue starting with his visit to Lahore in 1999 and Agra Summit in 2001, and Islamabad talks in 2004.

132. The last opportunity in 2009 for the two countries to meet came in September on the sidelines of the UNGA. Indian foreign Secretary and the External Affairs Minister met their counterparts from Pakistan in New York. India once again conveyed to Pakistan its concern at "very very slow pace of action" being taken against the conspirators and other responsible for the Mumbai terror attack. But if at the end of 2009, one was looking for satisfaction at the action taken by Pakistan either to dismantle the structure of terrorism or to bring the culpable elements for the Mumbai attack to book, there was nothing positive on the credit side. But hope is eternal and one lives with hope. As the Prime Minister said several times, one can choose one's friends but not neighbours. So where is the choice? It was perhaps with this hope that India once again, in the New Year, tried to test the waters by inviting Pakistan's Foreign Secretary for talks, which took place in New Delhi towards the end of February, 2010. In so doing it made it clear that the talks were not under the umbrella of the 'Composite Dialogue'. These were essentially to find out the progress Pakistan had made in bring the guilty men of Mumbai to book. That Pakistan gave it a different spin to hoodwink its public opinion is another story.

VI

Southeast, East Asia & Pacific

133. Ever since India embarked on its 'Look East' policy in the nineties, its engagement with the countries of the region has been on the upswing. India no longer regards the region as its extended neighbourhood, but its immediate neighbourhood given India's 1600 km long common border with Myanmar. With the Kaladan Multi-Modal Transit Project, agreement for which was signed in April 2008, coming up it will give India's northeast complete connectivity with Southeast Asia through Myanmar. Similarly the free trade agreements/comprehensive economic cooperation agreements would give India intensive and extensive trade and economic links, which would integrate Indian economy with the region. India is already founder member of the East Asia Summit and dialogue partner with the ASEAN. India is expected to become a member of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation grouping with the end of moratorium on new memberships in 2010.

Australia

134. India-Australian relations during the year were dominated by the problem of the Indian students studying in that country and coming under racial attacks from the fringe elements of the Australian society. This caused a good deal of worry to their parents in India. Naturally the Government of India was concerned. The Prime Minister and the External Affairs Minister spoke to their Australian counterparts who were assured of the Australian sincerity of good treatment for the Indian student community.

135. In August the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna visited Cairns

L

(Australia) in connection with the Pacific Island Forum's - Post Forum Dialogue and availed of this opportunity to convey to the Australian Foreign Minister Stephen Smith India's concerns. This issue dominated the discussions with the Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd and the Premier of the South Wales Government when they visited New Delhi later that year. New Delhi was assured of their full cooperation to safeguard the interests of the Indian students and promised stern action against the culprits. The high priority that New Delhi attached to the students' welfare was oozing out in the joint statement issued at the end of the visit of Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd on November 12. Mr. Rudd once again "reiterated that Australia had a zero tolerance approach to violence and was committed to taking all possible measures to protect the safety and welfare of all international students including Indian students."

136. New Delhi however felt that all assaults were not necessarily racist and emphasized the need for "orientation for students on living conditions and other information that would help them integrate with the society" in Australia. It was announced that specially designated student welfare officers would be available in the Indian High Commission and Consulates in Australia who would focus on issues related to Indian students.

137. The visit of Premier of the State of Victoria John Brumby in September gave him an opportunity to reassure the Ministers for Overseas Indian Affairs and Human Resource Development of heightened protection to the students studying there. While announcing a series of measures in this direction, he announced scholarship of AUD $ 10,000 to five Indian students in 2009 as part of a new International Scholarship programme. The Ministry of External Affairs also issued on June 12, an advisory to the Indian students going to Australia on how to prepare for their studies, the living conditions and the precautions etc during their stay in that country.

138. As a result of the Government of India's efforts, the student community felt secure. The Indian missions in Australia solicitous of the students' welfare as they always have been in the past, are now even more than ever before keeping themselves in touch with the student community and the local authorities on their problems.

139. On the political plane, Australia has been quite keen to keep the bilateral relations on an even keel, despite its reluctance to allow nuclear trade with India even after India had last year secured the necessary exemption from the NPT requirements from the Nuclear Suppliers' Group. New Delhi on its part too, appreciating the Australian policy compulsions, did not allow Canberra's disinclination to come in the way of reciprocating Australian eagerness for closer relations.

140. The visit of the External Affairs Minister Mr. S.M. Krishna to Australia in August, and the visits of Australian Foreign Minister and Prime Minister to New Delhi and the India-Australia Framework Dialogue went a long way to create a better climate of understanding between the two countries on both bilateral and regional issues. Australia supported India's quest for a permanent seat on the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) and also its membership of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation grouping when the membership moratorium ended in 2010. The high Point of the Prime Minister Rudd's visit was the Joint Declaration in which the two countries committed themselves to security cooperation that "will strengthen cooperation in a wide range of security and related areas including counter-terrorism, defence, disarmament and non-proliferation and maritime security". The Declaration enumerated eight elements of cooperation in this regard viz., information exchange, and policy coordination on regional and long term strategic and global issues, cooperation within the EAS and ASEAN Regional Forum, efforts to combat terrorism, trans-national organized crime, disaster management, maritime and aviation security, and police and law enforcement. They also identified the mechanism to achieve these objectives of cooperation. In the preamble to the separately issued Joint Statement, the two countries underlined their shared interests and values as pluralist democracies, global in outlook, but also closely integrated into the Asian region with rapidly expanding economic relationship and a shared desire to enhance and maintain peace, stability and prosperity in Asia through multilateral institutions which also needed to reform.

China

141. It was a mixed year for India - China relations. There were both areas of understanding and misunderstanding. The mature manner in which the two countries handled their problems ended on a happy note and solid cooperation at Copenhagen, which saved the day not only for them but also for the developing countries as a whole.

142. The relations between the two countries were summed up by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in his statement in the Lok Sabha made on December 9. He said "Our relations with China get very high priority in our strategic thinking. We would like to develop this cooperative partnership based on equality in which each side should be sensitive enough to the concerns, aspirations and sentiments of the other nation." India would celebrate the 60th year of establishment of diplomatic relation with China next year in "a befitting manner" since "these are reciprocal symbolic gestures which we make to our neighbours," said Mr. Krishna. Saying that India "value China's friendship, association and we would like to further take it to certain strategic levels" and he felt assured that "China is willing to reciprocate".

143. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh met his counterpart Wen Jiabao in Hua Hin on the sidelines of the India-ASEAN summit in October. Wen Jiabao recalled PM's remark that there was "enough space for both sides to develop and cooperate" and that "for the Asian Century to become a reality it is important that India and China should live in harmony and friendship and enjoy prosperity". Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at his press conference in Hua Hin on October 25 giving a broader perspective of his meeting with the Chinese Premier said: "I had a frank and constructive exchange of views with Premier Wen both during our formal meetings and at the gala dinner last night. We discussed all these issues and agreed that existing mechanisms for bilateral cooperation should be used to resolve all issues amicably in the spirit of the strategic and cooperative partnerships." Adding he said "The Premier and I reaffirmed the need to maintain peace and tranquillity on the border pending a resolution of the boundary question. Both of us agreed that we should continue and strengthen efforts to build political trust and understanding."

144. The External Affairs Minister Krishna too met the Chinese Foreign Minister twice during the year. The first meeting between the two was on July 22 at Phuket (Thailand) on the sidelines of the India-ASEAN Ministerial Conference and the second on October 27 on the sidelines of the RIC foreign ministers' meeting in Bengaluru. At Phuket they resolved to further deepen their ties, especially in bilateral trade targeted at $60 billion by the end of 2010. At Bengaluru they agreed once again on the "importance of further developing high level exchanges, of enhancing trade and economic cooperation" and added the need to further develop their "defence contacts". Speaking to the Bangalore Press Club on October 28 Mr. Krishna said "China wants to have good ties and I have often said India would like to have very friendly relations with China. Our effort is to take this relationship to the level of partnership. Hence there is goodwill on both sides and it augurs well."

145. On the India-China boundary question the two-day 13th meeting of the Special Representatives took place in New Delhi on August 7- 8. A statement issued by the Ministry of External Affairs said that "apart from the boundary issues, discussions covered a broad agenda which included the entire gamut of bilateral relations and regional and international issues of mutual interest". Describing relations with China as a key foreign policy priority for India, the National Security Advisor who led the Indian delegation to the talks said "the joint document on a 'Shared Vision for the 21st Century' signed during Prime Minister's visit to China in January 2008 has taken bilateral relations to a new level. There has been a significant expansion in bilateral cooperation in areas such as trade and investment, defence, culture, education and people-to-people exchanges".

146. His sentiments were reciprocated by the leader of the Chinese delegation who referred "to rapid growth witnessed in the bilateral relations in recent years". He "highlighting the importance of ongoing consultations and coordination between the two countries at multilateral fora", and expressed the hope that "the two countries will jointly meet global challenges in the spirit of the Shared Vision". Mr. Dai Bingguo said that "China takes a positive view of India's development and progress, and also supports a bigger role for India in international affairs."

147. A Chinese statement on the talks issued separately pointed out that "the Chinese Government and people value the strategic and cooperative partnership between China and India, the largest two developing nations with a combined population accounting for 40 percent of the world's total. Friendly coexistence, mutual beneficial cooperation and shared progress between the two neighbours will contribute not only to the people of the two countries but also Asia and the whole world. China and India have no other option than living in peace and developing side by side. China stands firmly committed to working with India to press ahead with the bilateral ties."

148. The growth in business and commercial ties which has been the biggest leitmotif in the relations between India and China provided the setting for the establishment of a new body - the India Business Forum (IBF) - launched on the 15th April in Beijing jointly by the Indian Ambassador Mrs. Nirupama Rao and Mr. Wang Jinzhen, Vice Chairman of the China Council for the Promotion of International Trade (CCPIT).

149. There were occasion causing concern in the relations between the two countries. The Chinese objection to the visit of Dalai Lama to Arunachal Pradesh was one. The other was the Chinese decision to issue visa to the residents of the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir visiting China on a separate sheet of paper than stamping it on their Indian Passport. The media perception that the Chinese were constructing diversion dams on Brahmaputra river which flows from Tibet to India and which could lead to reduced flows to the north-eastern region thus upsetting India's own plans to exploit the river in its territory, did not come true. The un-demarcated nature of the India - China border was also the source of some media speculation on the nature of patrolling of the border by the Chinese. The official New Delhi response that such misapprehension was not correct since both sides patrolled the border according to their individual understanding of the Line of Control in the absence of a clear demarcated line helped to calm the media raucousness. In fact the media was warned that such misplaced concerns could cause avoidable tension between the two countries. The Chinese financial assistance to Pakistan projects in the Pakistan-Occupied Kashmir too caused some unease to New Delhi. An article by a unknown Chinese scholar advocating disintegration of the Union into several regions was dismissed by New Delhi as "expression of individual opinion" and not "in accord with the officially stated position of China on India - China relations conveyed to us on several occasions, including at the highest level". India' deft handling at the ADB of Chinese stalling efforts for a loan for a project in Arunachal Pradesh saw Chinese quiet acquiescence to the Indian application for the loan. Thus on all the issues that could have caused some disquiet in the relations between the two countries, both the countries acted and reacted in such a subdued manner as to ensure that no irreparable damage was done to the long-term relationship.

Japan

150. The victory of Democratic Party of Japan under the leadership of Prime Minister Yukio Hatoyama with commitment to reorient Japan's relations with the West to look more towards East augured well for India's own policy of developing new links with the countries of East and Southeast Asia. Hatoyama's initiative for an East Asian community has therefore been a welcome move. India and Japan with no conflict of strategic interest, and sharing common goals to build stability, power equilibrium and institutionalized multilateral cooperation in Asia, have for some time been engaged in forging many bilateral institutional links, and can hope to build on that framework. New Delhi too did not fail to notice new government's keen desire to reorient Japan's traditional policy towards Washington. The announcement by Tokyo to end its 8-year old Indian Ocean refueling mission in support of US led war in Afghanistan, and desire to reexamine the earlier agreement on the storage and or transshipment of nuclear weapons on Japanese soil, was clear signal that Japan intended to look more towards its traditional area of influence in Asia than to be playing a second fiddle to the West in its pursuit of global objectives.

151. The institutionalized annual summit brought Mr. Hatoyama to New Delhi before the year 2009 drew to a close. This offered an opportunity for the two countries to go over the existing relationship to build a new one on it. The two prime ministers during their summit talks agreed to continue with the on-going economic cooperation in several fields. This cooperation had in recent years particularly contributed substantially to India's economic progress, and to strengthen the existing institutional links for strategic dialogue. They recognized the need for enhancing cooperation in strengthening security and to that extent expressed their satisfaction "at the finalization of the Action Plan with specific measures to advance security cooperation based on the Joint Declaration on Security Cooperation between India and Japan issued in October 2008" at the end of summit talks. During this visit, a new 'Action Plan' was agreed upon between the two prime ministers. The Japanese Prime Minister gave sufficient indication of the strategic cooperation envisioned by the two leaders when he told the media that the stepped up cooperation in the defence of the sea lanes of communication "would be very meaningful".

152. India too took the earliest steps to establish rapport with the new government as it took office. National Security Advisor visited Tokyo as the Special Envoy of Prime Minister. The Prime Minister himself met the new Prime Minister Hatoyama at Pittsburg in September and at Hua Hin in October. The Defence Minister AK Antony went to Tokyo in November and established mechanism for annual defence talks between the two countries at the ministerial and official levels. Foreign Secretary Mrs. Rao's visit in December was to prepare the groundwork for the Summit later that month.

153. There has been a steady growth in trade, economic relations and investments. As per the Japanese statistics, during 2008-09, the bilateral trade crossed 12 billion dollars despite the global economic slowdown. There is a trade target of 20 billion dollars by 2010. Japan already is the sixth largest investor in India with actual investments, already exceeding three billion dollars. The pace of investments has picked up in recent years. In the preceding eight or nine years alone, actual investments from Japan have been over 2.5 billion dollars.

154. The two sides, encouraged by the trend of growing economic and commercial relations and wanting to consolidate that trend, are in the process of concluding a Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement (CEPA). Twelve rounds of discussions have already been held which shows the importance that the two countries attach to this agreement. The last round was in Tokyo in September-October 2009..

155. Japan valuable assistance in large infrastructure development projects including the dedicated freight corridors and Delhi-Mumbai Industrial Corridor has been greatly appreciated in India. Since 2004, India has been the largest recipient of Official Development Assistance (ODA) from Japan. In 2008-09 India received ODA of 2.5 billion dollars which was almost 30 per cent of Japan's global ODA.

156. Recent years witnessed greater people-to-people contacts, cultural and educational exchanges. In September 2009 an India Cultural Centre was set up in Tokyo. Also the first ever Chair on India in the prestigious Tokyo University was set up. Japan is also extending assistance in the establishment of a green-field project, an IIT in Hyderabad.

157. The year too witnessed a number of defence exchanges including the trilateral Malabar Exercise in April-May and also the visit of three Japan Maritime Self-Defence Force ships to Goa in May.

158. India's multifaceted ties also cover a number of other important areas including energy. Other important areas are high-technology trade, science and technology cooperation, urban development etc.

159. Earlier in July when External Affairs Minister SM Krishna visited Tokyo for the 3rd India-Japan Strategic Dialogue he highlighted the fact of "the Strategic & Global Partnership between us (India and Japan)" being "an important factor in furthering our ties, as well as in promoting peace, stability and prosperity in Asia and the world."

Mongolia

160. In September India welcomed the Mongolian President Elbegdorj on his first visit to India which was also his first overseas visit after his election to the Mongolian presidency in June 2009. During the visit the two countries signed agreements in the field of peaceful uses of radioactive minerals and nuclear energy, health, culture and statistics. The agreement for peaceful uses of radioactive minerals and nuclear energy made Mongolia the sixth country after the U.S., Russia, France, Kazakhstan, and Namibia to sign the civil nuclear pact after the 45-member Nuclear Suppliers Group lifted the ban on nuclear trade in 2008. India too agreed to provide Mongolia a soft loan of 25 million US dollars to help it to stabilize its economy in the wake of the global financial crisis.

161. To help Mongolia in the human resources development and capacity building 60 slots allotted to it under the ITEC programme were doubled to 120. India too will assist Mongolia in the field of education, particularly in teaching English language, and information technology, besides extending assistance to set up an information technology centre. Regular consultations between the Foreign Ministries of the two countries were constituted.

162. The Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his remarks after his talks with the Mongolian President said: "India attached importance to its expanding defence exchanges and cooperation with Mongolia, including regular joint exercises between the armies, and agreed to strengthen cooperation in this area." It may be recalled that an agreement on Cooperation in Defence Matters was signed in 2001. The 5th joint military exercise under the agreement was held in Mongolia in September. The 3rd meeting of the Joint Working Group on Defence Cooperation was expected be held in Ulaanbaatar in 2010.

163. President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil in her banquet speech in honour of the Mongolian President highlighted the fact that both "India and Mongolia share common views on international peace, security and development". She welcomed the commitment of Mongolia along with that of India "against the menace of international terrorism that is afflicting our region".

West and Central Asia

164. India has extensive relations with the West Asian region. The bedrock of goodwill between India and West Asia comprising the Arab world resulted in the emergence of a strong edifice of political, economic, defence and security. India has noted the perceptible shift in the policies of the Arab countries from the West to the East. The Arab countries have shown considerable confidence in the stability of India's political, economic, and social institutions. Our democratic institutions have withstood all the tremors and upheavals caused by the shake up of the old economic and social order in the last six decades. The ability of Indian financial system to take in its stride the recent economic meltdown, and expeditiously recover from its worst impact, which caused the western financial system to crumble, did not go unnoticed in the region. The gulf is important for India's trade in the area. Trade in goods and services between India and the Gulf expanded rapidly and it exceeded US$ 87 billion in the fiscal year 2007-08. The year 2008 witnessed several high-level visits, highlighting the importance of the region in India's foreign policy, peaking with Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's visit to Qatar and Oman in November of that year. India's stake in the security of the waters around the Arabian peninsula are high, since the bulk of Indian trade with the west depends greatly on the security of its sea lanes. India-Qatar Defence and Security Agreement of 2008 is manifestation of the same concern. Trade in goods and services between India and the Gulf is expanding rapidly and it exceeded US$ 87 billion in the last fiscal year.

165. To enhance economic and commercial relationship with the Gulf there was now in place the necessary institutional arrangement-- the India-GCC Framework Agreement signed in 2004. There is a proposal to liberalize trade relations for which a Free Trade Agreement between India and GCC is under active consideration. The negotiating teams for this purpose have held three rounds of discussions so far. The Free Trade Agreement would complement the ongoing and rapidly expanding bilateral economic engagement with individual member countries of the GCC. The MOU signed between India and the GCC in 2008 for an India-Arab Cooperation Forum as a framework for dialogue for strengthening cooperation in such diverse fields as sustainable development, economic and commercial, educational, scientific, information technology etc., would go a long way in forging new links and enhancing cooperation in these fields.

166. The West Asian region remained active on the Indian radar in 2009. In April the Vice President M. Hamid Ansari visited Kuwait, It may be recalled that in June 2006 the Amir of Kuwait His Highness Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah had visited India. Since then there were two sessions of the Joint Commission between India and Kuwait - one in November 2006 followed by another in July 2008. In addition there were various exchanges at the Ministerial and official levels which sustained the momentum in bilateral relations across many sectors. At last count there were a little under 600,000 people of Indian origin working and living in Kuwait contributing to the economic development of Kuwait. Kuwait is an important trading partner of India. In 2007-08 bilateral trade amounted to about $ 8.4 billion. It accounts for about 12 per cent of Indian crude oil imports. The Indian Oil Corporation has recently renewed its contract for purchase of about nine million metric tonnes of crude and about 351 trillion cubic metres of gas from Kuwait. Obviously Kuwait's role in providing energy security to Indian economy is substantial.

167. In June Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor visited Dubai and had meetings with Sheikha Lubna, Minister for Foreign Trade as well as with Minister of Cabinet Affairs Mr. Mohammad Al Gergawi. The meetings gave Mr. Tharoor an opportunity to review India-UAE bilateral relations and discuss further measures to intensify them. In the same month the Foreign Minister of UAE Sheikh Abdullah Bin Zayed Al Nahyan, was on an official visit to India and had detailed discussions with Minister of External Affairs Shri S.M. Krishna on bilateral relations, regional and multilateral issues and on new avenues of cooperation, especially in the domain of trade and economy. It was acknowledged that the presence of over 1.5 million Indians in the UAE had contributed to the development of the economies of both India and the UAE. The UAE Minister conveyed his desire to enhance UAE's investment in India which currently stood at US $ 4.5 billion through FDI and FII routes and was among the top ten investors.

168. Dr. Tharoor visited the Republic of Yemen in June to participate in the 9th Ministerial meeting of the Indian Ocean Rim-Association of Regional Cooperation. He however, took the opportunity to call on the President of the Yemen Republic Ali Abdullah Saleh, and handed over a letter from the President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil reiterating the excellent state of bilateral relations and inviting the President of Yemen to visit India. President Saleh while expressing his gratitude for the invitation expressed his happiness at the deepening of the historic and civilizational relationship between India and Yemen. Dr. Tharoor also met with Dr. Abubakr Al Qirbi, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Yemen and exchanged views on bilateral, regional and multilateral issues of mutual concern including increasing incidence of terrorism and piracy and urgent need to further bolster the joint efforts for safe and secure transit of trade and other exchanges which are so vital for the economic growth of the region.

169. After the visit of Syrian President in 2008, the cooperation with Syria is increasing. As a first step a Memorandum of Understanding was signed on 14th May, 2009 between Department of Fertilizer, Ministry of Chemicals and Fertilizers, Government of India and General Company for Phosphate and Mines, Ministry of Petroleum and Mineral Resources, Government of the Syrian Arab Republic for providing consultancy services for preparation of technical, economic and environmental study report for development of rock phosphate resources of Syria. The study by an Indian consortium will be completed within 1-year. Cost of the feasibility study will be borne by the Government of India.

170. Palestine continues to be an important aspect of India-Arab relations. India's solidarity with the Palestinian people and its attitude to the Palestinian question reflects, perhaps more than any other issue, the enduring nature of Indo-Arab ties. In 1974, India was the first non-Arab country to recognise the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. In March 1980, the Government of India announced in Parliament India's decision to accord full diplomatic recognition to the PLO office in New Delhi. In 1988, India recognised Palestine as a State. India has now constructed the Palestine Embassy building in New Delhi, a gift of the people and Government of India to the Palestinian people. Chairman of the Palestinian National Authority Mahmoud Abbas visited New Delhi in October 2008. During his visit India extended US $ 10 million budgetary support to the Authority and another US $10 million for development projects besides signing an MOU to construct a school in the Palestinian territory at its cost.

171. New Delhi was greatly anguished when at the beginning of 2009 Gaza came under Israeli attack. India regretted that when talks were going on in Cairo among representatives of all concerned under the guidance of the French and the Egyptian officials, there was no sign of sorrow or concern about the plight of the million and half Gazan civilians living in a permanent state of fright. India expected an early end to the suffering of the people of Gaza and a return to a dialogue and resumption of the peace process. In October India increased its contribution to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) to $1 million. In January 2009, in response to an UNRWA Flash Appeal, the Government of India had made a special assistance of $1 million for relief work in Gaza Strip.

172. India has continued to maintain its contacts with the countries of Central Asia in 2009 as in the previous years. At the start of the year, in January President of Kazakhstan paid a state visit to New Delhi.

173. Sharing Indian concern about the menace of terrorism President Nursultan Nazarbayev strongly condemned the 26/11 terrorist attacks in Mumbai and reiterated the need for intensifying global cooperation in combating international terrorism. He conveyed assurance that Kazakhstan stood firmly with India in dealing with the scourge of global terrorism. He joined India in calling for early conclusion of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism within the UN framework. The signing of the Extradition Treaty would help law enforcement agencies to develop mutually beneficial cooperation, render required assistance and support to each other, which would be an important step towards controlling international crime and terrorism.

174. After the waiver by the NSG in 2008 Kazakhstan has come forward to cooperate with New Delhi in the civil nuclear energy field. The signing of a Memorandum of Understanding between Nuclear Power Corporation of India and National Atomic Company Kazatomprom JSC for the supply of uranium by Kazakhstan was a step in that direction. Both the countries agreed to the early conclusion of an Inter Governmental Agreement for cooperation in Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy. India-Kazakhstan Inter-Governmental Commission on Trade, Economic, Scientific, Technical, Industrial and Cultural Cooperation was an important instrument to develop and enhance trade and economic cooperation as well as cultural cooperation.

175. As part of her visit to Russia in September President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil visited Tajikistan, which remained an important partner for India in the Central Asian region. The President described Tajikistan as "our extended neighbourhood"-- a young nation with "an old civilization". Her visit was the first ever by an Indian President to Tajikistan. It was an historic occasion for the President to address the people of Tajikistan on their National Day and "convey to them the greetings and best wishes of the people and Government of India for their progress and prosperity". The President had fruitful exchange of views on global and regional issues with President Rahmon, whom, she recalled, she had hosted in Jaipur in August 2006. There too were fruitful discussions between the Indian trade delegation traveling with the President and Tajik delegation. The President extended an invitation to the Tajik President Rahmon to visit India.

Africa

176. The relations with the countries of Africa gained a new momentum in the wake of the India-Africa Forum Summit in 2008. The Delhi Declaration which was a political document covered bilateral, regional and international issues. These included Indian and African common positions on UN reforms, climate change, WTO, international terrorism, etc. The India-Africa Framework for Cooperation spelt out the agreed areas of cooperation. These areas span human resources and institutional capacity building, education, science & technology, agricultural productivity and food security, industrial growth, small & medium enterprises and minerals, health sector, development of infrastructure, and ICT.

177. Relying on the latest technology to secure greater depth in its diversified relationship with the continent, India launched an India-Africa Website to provide new avenues for exchange and dissemination of information, a new vehicle to reach out to them and a renewed commitment to Africa that even when living in another part of the world, it was not far from India. It is a matter of great satisfaction for New Delhi that its "duty-free preference scheme" for the Least Developed Countries, covering 94 per cent of India's tariff lines extended to 33 African countries.

178. As the year 2009 opened, the Federation of Indian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (FICCI) organized the India - Africa Business Partnership Summit. It offered an opportunity to the External Affairs Minister to reiterate India's commitment, made at the India-Africa - Forum Summit to more than double the amount of Lines of Credit to US$ 5.4 billion for the five-year period beginning 2008-09. India too is committed to provide US$ 500 million over the next 5 to 6 years for projects in critical areas such as higher and vocational education, science, IT, agriculture and renewable energy, from the 'Aid to Africa' budget. India has so far extended over US$ 3 billion of concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa.

179. Another significant chapter added in the year 2009 in the history of India-Africa relationship was the Pan-African e-Network Project, inaugurated on 26th Feb, 2009 by the External Affairs Minister amidst the presence of the Heads of Mission of the African countries in New Delhi. As of now 47 countries have signed up with the Telecommunications Consultants India Limited (TCIL), the project consultants for the link, to join it. Sao Tome was the 47th country to join it, with its Foreign Minister Dr. Carlos Alberto Pires Tiny signing the MOU in December 2009, during his visit to New Delhi.

180. With the commissioning of the Network Project, former president Dr. A P J Abdul Kalam's vision of connecting India with all 53 countries of the African Union with a satellite and fibre optic network for sharing India's expertise in education and health care, was translated into reality. The project is a unique example of South-South Cooperation based on similarities of circumstances and experiences. India has always been open to sharing its strength, democratic model of development and appropriate technologies that are cheap, yet effective with the developing countries particularly of Africa. It is no wonder that Africa has become the largest partner of India's technical assistance and capacity building programmes.

181. Under the Network project India has gifted a dedicated satellite for e-connectivity in sub-Saharan Africa to help bridge the digital divide. The Project created significant linkages for tele-education and tele-medicine, making available to the people of Africa, the facilities and expertise of some of the best universities and super-specialty hospitals in India.

182. The Ministry of External Affairs administered project, in addition, was equipped to support e-governance, e-commerce, infotainment, resource mapping and meteorological and other services in the African countries. It too provided VVIP connectivity among the Heads of State of the African countries through a highly secure closed satellite network. The Project budget of Rs. 542.90 crores covered the cost of supply, installation, testing and commissioning of hardware and software, end-to-end connectivity, satellite bandwidth, O&M support and provided the tele-education and tele-medicine services for 5 years.

183. It would provide tele-education services to 10,000 African students to undertake Post-Graduate, Under-Graduate, PG Diploma and Diploma and skill enabling certification courses in subjects such as Business Administration, IT, International Business, Tourism and Finance. The seven leading universities and educational institutions in India associated with the Project are: Amity University, NOIDA; University of Madras, Chennai; Indira Gandhi National Open University (IGNOU), New Delhi; Birla Institute of Technology and Science (BITS), Pilani; University of Delhi; IIT Kanpur and Indian Institute of Science (IISc.) Bengaluru.

184. As part of the tele-medicine services, online medical consultations are provided for one hour every day to each participating African country for a period of 5 years in various medical disciplines such as cardiology, neurology, urology, pathology, oncology, gynecology, infectious diseases/HIV-AIDS, ophthalmology, pediatrics etc. The twelve leading Indian Super Specialty Hospitals associated with the Project are: Apollo Hospital and Sri Ram Chandra Medical College and Research Institute, in Chennai; All India Institute of Medical Sciences, Escorts Heart Institute and Moolchand Hospital in New Delhi, Fortis Hospital in Noida, KEM Hospital in Mumbai, Care Hospital in Hyderabad, Amrita Institute of Medical Sciences, Kochi; Manipal Hospital and Narayan Hrudayaylaya, Bengaluru and Santosh Hospital, Ghaziabad. With the commencement of this service, some of the best medical specialists of India would be available for consultations online for the African patients.

185. Another important element of tele-medicine service is the Continuing Medical Education (CME) in various specialties which is intended to update the knowledge and upgrade the clinical skills of the practicing physicians and paramedical staff in the African countries. President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil eloquently underlined the importance of India's Africa programme in her banquet speech in honour of the visiting Benin President on March 4. She said the "cornerstone of India's policy on external relations is to help our friends in Africa with their socio-economic development and for the continent of Africa to emerge as a vibrant entity, well integrated with the world economy".

186. India's bilateral trade with Africa has grown manifold and reached a level of US$36 billion in 2007-08, up from US$3 billion in 2000-01. Given the concrete opportunities that exist between the two sides, India-Africa trade could easily be doubled to US$70 billion over the next five years.

187. That Africa has come into its own was forcefully demonstrated at the Copenhagen Climate Change Conference in December 2009. The backtracking of the developed countries on their draft after the Africans backed by India chose to walk out on their draft. It was indeed a turning point at the Conference. Despite the severe constraints faced by them, African countries have been making special efforts to achieve their development goals while controlling the green house gas emissions.

188. Africa unfortunately was badly hit by the financial meltdown of 2008. It was critical that the international community provided concrete assistance for their efforts to overcome the crisis, through provision of greater financial resources, technology transfer and capacity building. There was the need for easier access for African countries to developed markets. There was too the need to focus on actions that added value to African exports. The international community had to recognize and respect the indigenous and traditional knowledge available in Africa and the use of such knowledge in development efforts, climate change, and GHG emissions. The need for support for their own efforts was succinctly underlined by the UN Secretary General in his 7th Report on New Partnership for Africa's Development. The Report emphasized the need for concerted and urgent action by international development partners to mitigate the socio-economic impact of the global financial and economic crisis and help the African countries in their progress towards implementation of NEPAD and realization of the Millennium Development Goals. It was a matter of satisfaction for New Delhi that the report highlighted India's contribution towards Africa's development in the context of South-South cooperation.

189. India is also exploring possibilities of comprehensive economic cooperation agreements with the Common Market of Southern Africa (COMESA) and the East African Community (EAC). Significantly the FICCI sponsored India-Africa Business Partnership Summit in January 2009 was attended by the Rwandan President Paul Kagame, who was also the current Chairperson of the East African Community.

190. A framework agreement for a Preferential Trading Arrangement between India and the South African Customs Union (SACU) is in the pipeline. New Delhi in cooperation with the South African Development Community (SADC) was also developing projects in a number of sectors thereby expanding the scope for India-Africa cooperation in the coming years.

191. Since the inception of the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme in 1964, capacity building and human resource development in Africa has been an area of high priority for the Government of India. The ITEC programme has benefited thousands of experts and students from Africa who came for training courses in professional institutions in India. Drawing satisfaction from the success of this programme, New Delhi has increased the number of training slots for African countries from 1100 to 1600.

192. In addition, several thousand African students are currently studying in Indian universities and colleges. The number of scholarships for them has been doubled. Over the next five to six years India hopes to undertake in Africa, on a grant basis, projects in critical areas such as higher and vocational education, science, IT, agriculture and renewable energy. A sum of US$500 million has been allocated for this endeavour.

193. India too was extensively involved in peacekeeping efforts in Africa. Presently, India has over 7000 peacekeepers serving in Africa, including a 5000 strong contingent in the Democratic Republic of Congo. India's first full all-female formed police unit is currently deployed in Liberia. In addition to peacekeeping, this unit has been reaching out to the most vulnerable sections of the society i.e. women and children in inspiring them to stand on their own in their war torn society.

194. In recent years Oil has become a thrust area in Africa. India was happy to be collaborating in this sector too and identified five thrust areas in the oil and gas sector for cooperation. These include; buy more crude from Africa, invest more in upstream opportunities on bilateral basis in the continent as well as in third countries, explore opportunities to source more LNG from Africa, make available our skills, talent and technology in cost-effective manner for the benefit of the people of Africa. In his valedictory address to the India-Africa Hydrocarbon Conference held in New Delhi in December the Indian External Affairs Minister assured Africa that "India's approach to African resources is not a one way street," and added, "We will draw equal satisfaction when African oil fuels Africa's own development and growth. Our long standing priority is to serve as a partner in Africa's development". This approach underlines all the Indian efforts in this continent.

The United States of America

195. There were some trepidations in New Delhi with the inauguration of the Obama Administration in Washington, particularly in view of his stand on non-proliferation. But soon enough New Delhi felt assured that despite the President's views on this sensitive issue, there would be no change in the US position on the implementation of the India - US Civil Nuclear Energy Cooperation Agreement of 2008. Even when the US President led the UN Security Council to adopt a Resolution on Non-Proliferation, Washington understood India's position as conveyed in its letter of 23rd September addressed to the Security Council President which happened to be the United States. Another sign of warmth noted in New Delhi was when contrary to media reports the Administration in appointing a Special Envoy to tackle the problem of terrorism in Afghanistan, in deference to Indian sensitivities, confined his role to Afghanistan and Pakistan. In a special gesture to Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh the President called him on December 1, when he announced his plan of 'surge' in Afghanistan to explain the US policy to him.

196. New Delhi too appreciated the President's gesture to invite Prime Minister Manmohan Singh as his first State Guest at the White House after assuming the Presidency. The United States too did not shirk from putting pressure on Islamabad to cooperate with New Delhi to tackle the problem of terrorism in the Sub-continent and take sufficient action against the culprits held responsible for the 26/11 attack in Mumbai. As a mark of solidarity with India, Secretary of State Ms. Clinton visiting India in July, first landed in Mumbai and stayed at the Hotel Taj Mahal which bore the brunt of the terrorist attack. While at the Hotel she interacted with the staff and paid tribute to those killed during the terror attack.

197. The External Affairs Minister besides welcoming the US Secretary of State Ms. Hillary Clinton to New Delhi in July, had another meeting with her in September in New York on the sideline so the UN General Assembly session. Foreign Secretary visited Washington in March and the Assistant Secretary of State William Burn paid a return visit to New Delhi in October.

The US National Security Advisor too paid a visit to New Delhi in June. These high level visits helped to keep the channels of communications active at personal level between leaders of the two countries. As pointed out above in the section on Civil Nuclear Energy Cooperation there was some misgivings in India about the US commitment on cooperation in this vital field of particular interest to India in view of President Obama's new found zeal for non proliferation, the same were dispelled at the highest level as announced by the Prime Minister himself.

198. The high point of the India - US relations in 2009 was the State visit by Prime Minister to Washington for a summit meeting with US President Barack Obama in November. At their first meeting in April on the sidelines of the G-20 Conference in London they had established personal rapport. President Obama after his meeting made significant remarks about the relations between the two countries that set the tone for the rest of the year -- "We are the world's two largest democracies. India, like America is full of diversity, full of energy and it is a complicated place like the United States is complicated. But there are very few countries that have such a strong affection and affinity between the two as between India and the United States. What is also true is that, I think, the United States sees India as a global power, and a critical partner in helping deal with the challenges of twenty first century- every thing from climate change, to poverty, to trade, to science and innovation." President Obama and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh along with leaders of the other BASIC countries interacted closely at the Copenhagen summit in December to save it from complete collapse.

199. Desire of both the countries to raise the level of cooperation in other fields like defence, climate change, high technology commerce, civil aviation, education and human resource development, were confirmed during the visit of Prime Minister to Washington in November. The preamble of the Joint Statement issued on November 23 made a significant declaration that "the common ideals and complementary strength" of the two countries "today provide a foundation for addressing the global challenges of the 21st century"; and their resolve "to harness these shared strengths and to expand the U.S.-India global partnership for the benefit of their countries, for peace, stability and prosperity in Asia, and for the betterment of the world." To New Delhi's satisfaction Washington agreed with New Delhi that "the threat posed to regional and global security" emanated "from India's neighbourhood" and its impact was "beyond the region" and in this context agreed that it was "absolute imperative to bring to justice the perpetrators of this terrorist attack".

Europe

200. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's visit to France as Guest of Honour at the Bastille Day Parade and his visit to Russia for the annual summit, President's visits to Russia, the UK, Cyprus, Spain, Poland and External Affairs Minister's visit to Belarus and British Foreign Secretary's visit to New Delhi during the year kept the relations between India and Europe on an active trail.

France

201. The Prime Minister's presence at the Bastille Day Parade was particularly important since a contingent of the Indian army was also invited to take part in the parade. In 2008, President Sarkozy was the Chief Guest at the Indian Republic Day parade. In his remarks after the parade Dr. Manmohan Singh spoke of the global significance of the Bastille Day and the ideals of the French Revolution of liberty, equality and fraternity. After the lunch organized in his honour by President Sarkozy, the latter introduced Dr. Singh to thousands of people gathered at the Elysee Palace National Day Reception.

202. During the brief visit of the Prime Minister and among his very busy schedule President Sarkozy found time to review bilateral relations between India and France, who are now strategic partners. Their bilateral cooperation extended to education, health, defence, space, peaceful uses of nuclear energy and several other fields. Both leaders expressed satisfaction at the steady deepening, broadening and development of the relationship. There was a strong convergence of interest on threats posed by terrorism and measures to counter it. They agreed to further strengthen cooperation in this area. They also expressed satisfaction at the implementation of the civil nuclear energy cooperation agreement signed in 2008 and cooperation in space and wide ranging defence cooperation.

President's Visits to Spain and Poland

203. The President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil's visit to Spain was the first ever State Visit by the President of India to that country. The visit to Poland was the fourth State Visit by an Indian President. Both the visits took place in April. While in Madrid the King and the Queen hosted a banquet in her honour, in Warsaw President Mrs. Kaczynska hosted it. In both the countries, she addressed meetings between the Indian business delegation accompanying her and their business delegations. She also addressed the members of the Indian community in the two countries. In Madrid she was honoured with the Key of the City by the Mayor. In Poland two agreements on Tourism and Health and Medicine were signed, which the President said would open "new areas of cooperation in these sectors". She expressed the hope that these initiatives would "provide a sound framework for expanding people-to-people level contacts between our two countries".

204. At the end of her visit to the two countries, in a statement to the media she expressed her happiness that the objectives of her visit to the two countries had been "fulfilled", and that she "found, both in Spain and Poland, a common resonance and desire to more effectively and meaningfully cooperate in matters pertaining to trade, investment, development of infrastructure, renewable energy, energy, pharmaceuticals, agriculture, the auto sector, defence, tourism, IT, culture and education".

205. About her discussions in the two capitals she said "I also had a detailed exchange of views with the leadership both in Spain and Poland on the situation in our respective regions and agreed to strengthen our already useful cooperation in multilateral organizations, especially the United Nations. The global financial crisis was another factor that brought home to all of us that this is the right opportunity for us to leverage each others' complementarities and synergies."

President's Visits to the United Kingdom and Cyprus

206. In October the President visited the U.K and Cyprus. In UK it was the third state visit by an Indian President but after almost twenty years. The previous two visits took place in 1963 and in 1990 when President S. Radhakrishnan and R. Venkataraman visited the UK. The Queen hosted a banquet in her honour. She had a meeting with Prime Minister Gordon Brown and held important discussions with him. She also addressed a business meeting organized by the UK-India Business Council in which the business delegation accompanying her participated. The Lord Mayor of the City of London hosted a banquet in her honour at the Guild Hall. In addition, President Patil also interacted with British Members of Parliament in a meeting organized at the Westminster by the All-Party Parliamentary Group on India.

207. The President had an interaction with the Members of the Indian Community soon after her arrival in London on the 26th October. She attended the function held at India House, where memorabilia associated with Mahatma Gandhi was handed over to her. She made significant remarks when she said: "It was a profoundly emotional moment for me. We are carrying these precious items back to India." She too visited the Royal collection at Windsor where she saw a small shawl made with yarn spun by Gandhiji and gifted in 1947 to Her Majesty the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh for their wedding.

208. She also participated in the ceremony at the Buckingham Palace where the Queen's Baton Relay was launched for the Fourteenth Commonwealth Games being held in India in 2010.

209. In February, consultations between the Foreign Offices of India and the UK were held in London. The Indian delegation was led by Foreign Secretary Mr. Shivshankar Menon and the British delegation by Permanent Undersecretary Sir Peter Ricketts. The last Foreign Office Consultations were held in New Delhi on 5th September, 2007. This was an occasion to review bilateral and International developments including the global financial meltdown and reform of International Financial Institutions, the G-20 Summit and Climate Change. The Foreign Secretary also met Lord Malloch-Brown, Minister for Asia, Africa and the UN. Both sides expressed happiness at the positive growth in bilateral relations and satisfaction at the strategic partnership which has developed between the two countries over the last years.

210. The President's state visit to Cyprus was from October 29th to October 31st. During the visit the President had bilateral talks with her Cypriot counterpart Mr. Dimitris Christofias. She also met the President of the House of Representatives of Cyprus Mr. Marios Karoyian and the Archbishop of Cyprus Archbishop Chrysostomos II.

211. A business delegation from India representing FICCI, CII and ASSOCHAM accompanied her. It interacted with the business delegations from the Cyprus-India Business Association and the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce and Industry. She met with the Indian community which is about 4000 strong and consisted of professionals, students and others.

212. The warmth of relations with Cyprus was reflected in various landmarks in Nicosia like location of the Cypriot Parliament on the Jawaharlal Nehru Avenue with the Statue of Mahatma Gandhi at the entrance and the Indira Gandhi Street where the Indian High Commission is located. In her farewell message summing up the significance of her visit she said: "my visit to Cyprus reinforced the strong bonds that already exist and helped define the contours of a future cooperation within the context of a rapidly changing world."

Russia

213. The highlight of the India-Russia relations in 2009 was the annual summit in Moscow. The three-day Moscow visit in December by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh culminated in the signing of six agreements. This provided enough proof that New Delhi's relations with Moscow were stand alone and not at the cost of any other relationship. This was confirmed by the Prime Minister himself while addressing the media in Moscow on December 7. He said India - Russia relationship "stands on its own footing and is not influenced by our relations with any other country". Of the agreements signed, the agreement for joint production of multi-role transport aircraft, a $100 million credit line for Indian goods and services in Russia, close cooperation in the field of civil nuclear energy, and an agreement on the pricing of Admiral Gorshkov, the aircraft carrier underlined the message that the two countries were not prepared to dilute their old relationship because of New Delhi developing newer relationships. The participation by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in the SCO summit in June at Yekaterinburg at the Russian President's personal invitation, despite India being only an observer, was another signal of the warmth of personal relationship between the leaders of the two countries. Russia reciprocated in full measure the Indian gesture, by insisting that the rules of the membership of the SCO be finalized early, to facilitate Indian entry into it. It would give India a toehold in Central Asia, a strategically important area, particularly from the energy security angle. At the beginning of year in February, Russia in a display of its friendship towards New Delhi had signed a contract for the much needed long-term supply of 2000 tons of natural uranium pellets for Heavy Water Reactors and another 60 tons for Low Enriched Uranium pellets for Boiling Water Reactor. India too announced the two sites for the setting up of new reactors with Russian cooperation, agreement for which was signed in 2008.

214. Otherwise also 2009 was a special year in India - Russia relations. It was the Year of India in Russia. As stated above, in June Prime Minister had visited Russia for the Yekaterinburg summit meetings of the BRIC and the SCO. In September President Pratibha Patil paid a five-day state visit to Russia. In the same month Commerce and Industry Minister Anand Sharma led a 70-member delegation of Indian business leaders to a Russian-Indian Forum on Trade and Investment, which was followed in quick succession by the visits of External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna and Defence Minister A.K. Antony. The appointment of heavyweight Deputy Prime Minister Sergei Sobyenin as the Russian co-chair for the Indo-Russian Inter-Governmental Commission (IRIGC) on Trade, Economic, Scientific, Technological and Cultural Cooperation did not go unnoticed in New Delhi as also his gesture in visiting New Delhi in October to prepare for the Prime Minister's visit to Moscow for the annual Summit. In forging closer relationship the two countries are conscious that the global power is fast gravitating to the Asia-Pacific region, and there was mutual advantage as Russia begins to redevelop Siberia and the Far East.

215. The global economic crisis too played a role in pushing the two countries closer to each other. Despite a world trade slump, Indo-Russian commerce grew more than 10 per cent in 2009 to hit the figure of US $ 7.5 billion. The target to 2010 was set at $10 billion. At its annual session in October the Inter-Governmental Commission set a new target for 2015 - $20 billion, which was still considered a modest figure, but would mark a big leap from the past decade when bilateral trade stagnated at $2-3 billion a year. Energy is emerging as an important focus between the oil rich Russia and energy starved India. New Delhi had invested US $ 2.8 billion in an oil field on Sakhalin off Russia's east coast and was in talks with the energy firms Rosneft and Gazprom for more blocks in north Russia. Now that India has obtained the necessary waiver from the NSG for nuclear trade, Russia is also emerging a major player in the development of nuclear energy. Besides the two new reactors agreement for which was signed in 2008 as mentioned earlier, possibility of Russia setting up more nuclear reactors remains wide open for the future.

216. The visit of President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil to Moscow in September was an important occasion for a review of ongoing bilateral cooperation between India and the Russian Federation and exchange of views on ways and means to further strengthen India-Russia bilateral ties in the future. She also exchanged views on regional and international issues of importance with the Russian leaders.

217. She noted with satisfaction the level of contacts between the political leadership of the two countries including at the annual Summit level as well as meetings and exchanges at Ministerial and other levels.

218. She too expressed satisfaction with ongoing efforts to achieve the bilateral trade target of US$ 10 billion by 2010 which she felt, given the potential for economic cooperation that existed, was much below their potential. The private sectors in both countries need to take a lead on this issue, she stressed.

219. She was happy that her visit coincided with the celebrations of The Year of India in Russia. President Medvedev and the President participated in a Gala Concert showcasing the colorful mosaic of Indian culture during her stay in Moscow.

XI

220. With the increase in the bandwidth of India's engagements globally, the Ministry of External Affairs in New Delhi and its diplomatic missions, which are its eyes and ears are facing new challenges. Foreign Relations are no longer confined to what has been classically understood the role of a diplomat, observing protocol, interacting with the chancelleries of the world and delivering the messages of war and peace. Until some years ago it was enlarged to pursuing trade and economic interests. This too is passé. The sophistication, the growing needs of the developing economy and globalization have brought about qualitative change in the functioning of the Ministry and the Missions. Energy, environment and climate change, terrorism, science and technology, biotechnology, I.T, nano technology, space, and the like are the core of the new diplomatic vocabulary. The World Trade Organization has ruled out trade protectionism. It has dismantled the trade barriers which had segregated economies for centuries. It has given way to market economy, competition and free trade. The challenge of high growth and social change is no longer the attribute of domestic politics but has today assumed international ramifications. The need to bridge the gap between the rich and the poor is the demand of a democratic polity on which India prides itself. The development is no longer the process of mere planning, it needs attracting foreign investments and modern technology and even participation of multinational companies. All these have foreign policy implications even if they are governed by domestic compulsions. While much of the burden of reconciling the conflicting demands of modernization and globalization may fall on the technocrats, the Foreign Service bureaucracy today cannot escape shouldering its own share of the challenge.

221. The Ministry of External Affairs conscious of the new challenges has taken steps to meet them head on. New divisions have been created with duly qualified and trained officers to head them; training programmes are organized for its personnel to keep them up-to-date with new developments. The Foreign Service Institute in New Delhi is geared to meet the new challenges and needs.

222. As part of the same exercise the conference of the heads of mission has been institutionalized as an annual affair. The structure of international system has changed beyond recognition; time and space stand cut short by the electronic means of communication, the challenges have become rapid and give little time to think and ponder. Responses have to be quick and instant. It is in this perspective that the utility of the conference has to be seen. It provides an opportunity to the personnel at home and abroad to understand each other and develop a common outlook on global problems allowing local orientation as necessary to meet the demands of the time and situation.

223. The second conference of Heads of Indian Mission was inaugurated by the External Affairs Minister on August 24. In his inaugural speech he laid down the strategic goals-'development, inclusive economic growth and alleviation of poverty'- and laying down the task of the foreign service, he said "the main purpose of our foreign policy is to assist in the fulfillment of these goals by providing an enabling external environment which ensures security, promotes trade, enhances our influence in the world". Describing terrorism as the main challenge he said the foreign service has to ensure that "neighbourhood is stable and peaceful and that our surrounding environment is conducive to the pursuit of our national goal of comprehensive socio-economic development".

224. The Prime Minister in his address "emphasized the integral link of India's foreign policy with domestic policies particularly economic policy" and said "the country's foreign policy should be aimed at addressing the challenges of mass poverty, ignorance and disease in the country, which were the primary concern of the Indian state and polity".

225. Widening the scope he identified "three pillars of our global engagement -(i) sustaining capital inflows to supplement our investment efforts, (ii) the need to take advantage of rapid scientific and technological developments in the world which provide an opportunity for India to leap frog its technological development, and (iii) the need to ensure that the country's growth is not constrained by scarcity of natural resources.

226. Making it clear that "insularity was not an option" he underlined the imperative of India playing a role in the international arena "in a manner that makes a positive contribution to finding solutions to major global challenges, whether in the field of trade or climate change". He flagged terrorism as a menace and the need to tackle it with "full vigour".

227. The road map is laid down. The task of the Ministry of External Affairs and its missions is cut out. The Challenges are evident and need no elaboration. Both the External Affairs Minister and the Prime Minister have spoken loud and clear. The Year 2010 would test the mettle of the Foreign Office personnel in fulfilling the mandate entrusted to them.

001. Inaugural Address by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Naval Academy.

Ezhimala (Kerala), January 8, 2009.

It is my great pleasure to be present here today at this magnificent campus overlooking the Arabian Sea. There could not have been a better place for the establishment of India's Naval Academy. I am grateful to the Government of Kerala for having made this possible.

Today marks the realization of a dream of our late Prime Minister Shri Rajiv Gandhi who laid the foundation stone of this Academy. The decision to establish a world class Naval Academy was a truly forward-looking one. As I look at the vast expanse of the Arabian Sea before me and the Indian Ocean beyond, it is easy to see why the Indian Navy must have a much greater role in safeguarding the Nation's vital security interests.

The Mumbai attacks have highlighted the need for heightened vigilance and response to asymmetric threats from the sea. We face such threats not only in the Arabian Sea but also in the Indian Ocean. There is a marked increase in the attempts by various terrorist and other groups to use the blue waters around India for nefarious purposes. This is a matter of concern.

This emerging maritime security environment greatly enhances your responsibilities. We have a coastline of over 7600 kms. with over 1200 island territories spread across the Indian Ocean. We have a large Exclusive Economic Zone. We have a vital interest in the Indian Ocean and a close relationship with countries of the Indian Ocean Rim, and specially the Gulf region.

We should also recognize that there will be other competing interests whose maritime presence in the sphere of our interest and our influence will have to be carefully monitored.

The importance of the Indian Navy in safeguarding our vital security interests has thus become paramount. There can thus be no doubt that the Indian Navy must be the most important maritime power in this region.

It is essential for the Navy, the Coast Guard and the intelligence agencies to coordinate their efforts much more closely. We need to develop credible strategies to counter all threats from the sea. On its part the government will take all necessary measures to ensure that the Coast Guard and the Navy are fully equipped to protect the seas and oceans around us.

The Gulf is part of our extended neighbourhood, separated only by the Arabian Sea, of which the Indian Navy is one of the sentinels. India and the countries of the Gulf have a shared view of peace and prosperity in the region. Many of the Gulf countries look upon India as a friendly and benign neighbour on which they can depend in times of difficulty and need. Nearly five million people of Indian origin live here. I strongly condemn the hostilities taking place in Gaza and express dismay at the unfortunate killing of hundreds of innocent civilians. We call for the immediate cessation of hostilities so that a settlement based on dialogue can be arrived at. I reiterate our unstinted and unwavering support to the just Palestine cause. This is an area of special priority for India and over the next decade and more this focus would only intensify further.

Another key role that the Indian Navy will play would be to safeguard the sea-lanes of communication, through which pass the bulk of our energy supplies and our sea-borne trade. As India's oil and gas imports increase demands on the Navy will become further pronounced. There is an inextricable link between our economic resurgence and our maritime power.

As economic power shifts to Asia, the demand for energy and the volume of trade passing through the Indian Ocean region will expand rapidly. This shift is being accompanied by the emergence of a host of threats that travel through the oceans.

These include the transportation of weapons of mass destruction, small arms and other weaponry through the oceans to the hinterland; the threat of piracy in international waters; organized crime; drug trafficking; environmental degradation; rising sea-levels; illegal migration and human smuggling.

The actions taken by the Navy recently to combat piracy in the Gulf of Aden and off the coast of Somalia have been timely. I would like to commend the professionalism of the Navy, which has been widely acknowledged across the world.

Traditional naval powers continue to rely upon their sea-control assets while emerging powers are developing sea-denial capabilities. More and more resources are being spent on naval modernization and research and development for new ship designs and battle space dominance through information networking. Increasingly, space and information technology are being harnessed for enhancing naval capabilities. The ongoing Revolution in Military Affairs and network-centric warfare has also impacted on the navies as the joint-ness between the land, air and naval forces improves.

All this is leading to the emergence of a new international maritime order, one that is characterized by a great deal of flux. This will have major implications for India. The Indian Navy will be required to have capabilities to perform in the entire spectrum of conflict ranging from military missions and strategic deterrence to humanitarian assistance. As India moves ahead, it would need naval capabilities commensurate with its expanding national interests.

Today naval power is not just about fighting wars. It has an integral role to play in international diplomacy, commerce, energy supplies, exploitation of sea resources and ensuring order at sea. In such a scenario naval interactions have an important role to play. The large number of exercises that India has held in the recent years with several countries has resulted in greater exposure for the Indian Navy. They have enhanced the ability of the Indian Navy to operate with other navies to respond to common security threats.

Keeping the sea-lanes of commerce open, projecting power and maintaining strategic stability dictate that India should possess a strong blue water Navy. The sea is increasingly becoming relevant in the context of India's security interests and we must re-adjust our military preparedness to this changing environment. We have in place an ambitious plan for force modernization of the Navy which will contribute to the Navy's emergence as a three-dimensional force.

To face up to these challenges the Navy needs well trained manpower. I am confident that the Naval Academy will produce well rounded graduates with the latest scientific and technical skills, and a broad awareness of our national interests.

I congratulate all those who have contributed towards the creation of this institution. Such institutions are better known by the quality of their alumni than by their stone facades and I have no doubt that INS Ezhimala will, year after year, send out future generations of naval officers of whom the country will be proud.

I have great pleasure in dedicating the Naval Academy to the Nation.

Jai Hind.

Distinguished Guests, Media representatives

Ladies & Gentlemen:

I am very happy to be amongst this distinguished gathering of Ministers, policy makers, entrepreneurs, engineers, geoscientists, academics and other energy sector professionals from across the world. May I begin by wishing you a 'Very Happy New Year'. I truly hope that 2009 spreads peace, prosperity and goodwill all around and in abundant measure.

I am pleased that India's premier hydrocarbon sector event Petrotech has rapidly evolved as one of the biggest forums in Asia for fostering partnership, knowledge sharing, technology display and global co-operation in the energy sector. I congratulate Indian Oil Corporation and the Ministry of Petroleum and Natural Gas for this.

Ladies and Gentlemen, historically, and especially since the Industrial Revolution there has always been a correlation between economic growth and energy consumption. Energy is a prime driver of economic growth, but not all countries are equally blessed with energy resources.

Over the last few years, India the world's second fastest economy has grown at about 9 percent per year. We are also counted as the seventh largest energy producer. But our per capita energy consumption is less than one-third of the global average. We are way short of providing electricity to all our citizens. Over 70 per cent of our crude oil is imported. The energy deficit that we face poses one of the most important challenges to our economic development. Unless we are able to overcome this, we will have to re-evaluate our development expectations.

The recently adopted Integrated Energy Policy envisages an energy mix that focuses on augmenting the domestic energy resource base and increasing efficiency while strategising our stakes in energy assets overseas. India aspires to a medium-to-long term strategy of shifting from fossil fuels to renewable and non-conventional sources of energy. Since oil and gas account for about 45 % of our current energy requirements, we are aware that even in the most optimistic of scenarios our dependence on hydrocarbons will continue in the coming decades.

Despite these energy constraints we are determined to maintain our rate of growth because that is the only way to defeat poverty and meet our human development goals. Notwithstanding the global economic gloom, we hope to grow at a 7 percent this year. India is backed by strong fundamentals like sustained high domestic savings and investment rates, productivity growth and domestic demand. We are confident of coping with external shocks and sustaining the India growth story.

The main challenge for us is to ensure the continuous availability of safe, clean and accessible energy at commercially competitive prices. Energy Security concerns are central to our national interest and an important aspect of our economic diplomacy.

Our production of oil and gas is modest by international standards, but we are a significant player in the entire spectrum of the hydrocarbon value chain. In the years to come, India's growth plans will undoubtedly make us a major contributor to the incremental global energy demand. As a growing energy market the potential for international investments is immense. The Government of India favours a competitive and market oriented hydrocarbon sector with increasing private sector and foreign investment in all the important segments of the industry.

Friends, crude oil prices were on a roller coaster in 2008. Historic highs and 4-year lows were experienced in less than 6-months. Even in their dramatic drop, oil prices promise to hit back with a vengeance. It is not difficult to visualize that a recovery from the existing global meltdown could witness a sharp demand driven increase in prices. This extreme price volatility underscores the price sensitivity to short-term market imbalances, diminishing global spare capacity and ultimately the finite nature of oil and natural gas resources. What is more, hydrocarbons are not inspired by market principles alone. Geopolitics also have an influential voice in determining the availability and price of hydrocarbons. As I am not an astrologer in such matters, I shall not guess the route oil prices will take from here. What can, nevertheless, be said with a sense of surety is that, in the long run, this acute volatility in oil prices will profit neither the producer nor comfort the seller.

The time has come to recognize that our past approach to energy issues has limitations. A 'nationalist' position on energy matters will close more doors than it will open. The theme for this Conference - 'Energy Independence with Global Cooperation' is extremely appropriate as it actually prescribes "energy inter-dependence," which if accepted, is half way home to the idea of energy security. The logic of "energy inter-dependence" is more obvious than it appears. There is limited gain in taking an exclusivist, zero sum game approach on energy issues. For instance, any major development in oil supplies, whether a significant find or disruption to supplies by a blockade or militant action affects prices worldwide. On the larger canvas, energy interests of all countries are ultimately tied together.

The imperative before us is to renew the global energy architecture by developing an arrangement that incorporates long-term supply and demand side concerns. A new cooperative framework, based on dialogue and transparent exchange of data that ensures an open, transparent, competitive and stable market ought to emerge.

Increasing demand for hydrocarbons is given and will have to be met. The focus is on realistic answers to questions about supply, investments and technology up- gradation in the oil and gas sector. I look forward to Petrotech 2009 deliberating these issues.

I would also in particular, draw your attention to the safety and security of oil and gas installations and their transport infrastructure. The recent terrorist attack in Mumbai was a direct strike at India's economic development. This unpardonable criminal attack only underscores the risk all countries face from economic sabotage, irrespective of whether these acts are authored by states or merely carried out by so-called non-state actors. The global hydrocarbons sector would increasingly be even more vulnerable to such threats. Protecting these assets would not simply be a law and order problem for an individual country, whether an energy exporter or consumer. Stability of energy supplies, security of energy transportation and creation of new energy infrastructure and its protection has to be a common goal requiring coordination and cooperation of all countries. It would be my recommendation that this Conference pay some attention to this issue as well.

In this New Year, talk of 'recession and recovery' has become common in the wake of one of the biggest global financial and economic downturns. I realize that this gloom also surrounds the hydrocarbons sector. Before I conclude, let me persuade the participants in this Conference to optimistically look above and beyond the pall of economic uncertainty. Let us prepare and plan for an energy future that is minus imbalances and shocks.

With this, I declare the Petrotech 2009 - 8th International Oil and Gas Conference open and wish it all success!

Jai Hind!

003. Address of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Award Ceremony of the Economic Times.

Mumbai, January 17, 2009.

This function, originally scheduled for November had to be postponed because of the terrorist attack on Mumbai in that month. Although I visited the city along with Congress President Smt. Sonia Gandhi, immediately after that event, I had no opportunity to speak in public on that occasion. I would, therefore, like to use this opportunity to say a few words on that painful subject.

Although that horrific event is behind us, the scars it has left remain. I was a resident of Mumbai for three happy years and I feel keenly the pain and anger of the city. To the people of Mumbai, I can only say that we will spare no effort to ensure that their city does not suffer any such attack in the future.

My heart goes out to the families of those who lost their lives and also those who suffered injuries. I particularly wish to salute the bravery and sacrifice of the men of the Mumbai police and the NSG who laid down their lives fighting against this attack.

Before I proceed further, I would request you to rise and observe one minute of silence as a mark of respect to the victims of the tragedy

The choice of Mumbai as the target of this barbaric attack was not without deeper intent. It was meant to be an attack on our very nationhood. Mumbai is the best-known symbol of free, pluralistic, dynamic and cosmopolitan India. That is precisely why the terrorists chose to attack it.

But the terrorists should know that the civilized world is against them. They must know that this onslaught on the founding ideals of India and on its secular, pluralistic and vibrant democracy is an onslaught on all civilized nations. They must know that this is something that no country can or will tolerate.

We have shared the evidence that we have gathered so far on the incidents with Pakistan and others. Pakistan has admitted that the arrested terrorist is their national. We expect Pakistan to take all the consequent next steps against all those who have planned, organized and executed these horrific crimes.

The Pakistani government has announced that the results of their investigations will be made public in a few days. I urge the Pakistani authorities to come out with a full and complete disclosure of all the facts surrounding the case, without attempts at denial, diversion or obfuscation.

Pakistan should act against the LeT and other terrorist groups and their sponsors - in its own interest, in the discharge of its obligations under international instruments, and to honour the bilateral commitments it has given us at the highest level. It should ensure that nothing like Mumbai, or the attack on our Embassy in Kabul ever happens again.

Apart from hundreds of innocent Indians, innocent civilians from 21 countries were either killed or injured in the attacks. We expect the international community to use its full weight to see that the investigations are pursued vigorously and brought to a speedy and logical conclusion and that terror groups operating from Pakistan are completely shut down. If Pakistan is sincere in its words, it should show through its actions that it will not tolerate these assaults on civilized norms of behaviour.

However, at the end of the day I recognize that this is a problem that we will have to tackle ourselves, with our own sources and our own determination. We need to strengthen our own ability to deal with such attacks and our intelligence capability to anticipate them. The Mumbai attacks revealed deficiencies in our systems that we are working to remedy. After the attacks, we have taken a number of steps to strengthen our ability to fight with terrorism. We have tightened our laws to deal with terrorist crimes. We have established a National Investigating Agency, which is primarily intended to coordinate investigations into terrorist offences. The flow of information from various agencies and the processing of such information for action has been improved. We have finalized details of a coastal defence system in which the Navy would play a key role while the coastal command would directly function under the Coast Guard. Steps to improve our intelligence gathering capability, including the use of more sophisticated technology, have also been initiated.

Let me now turn to the agenda of this meeting.

I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to all those receiving awards today. These awards recognize the superior performance of the recipients as individuals and companies in different fields. They, and the teams working with them which made their achievement possible, fully deserve our applause and accolades. We hope that their performance will be a beacon to others to emulate their achievements and perhaps even exceed them.

And yet, I must also point out that superior economic performance will not be easy in the year ahead. The global economic horizon is cloudier than it has been for a long time. It will be a testing time for the economy and for individual businesses in all sectors.

Before the year 2008-09 began, we knew that it was going to be a year of cyclical downturn in the industrialised world. We did not know at that time that the financial difficulties in the sub-prime mortgage lending sector in the US, which had already surfaced in 2007, would quickly snowball into a truly global financial crisis and that in turn, would lead to a severe recession which has been described by many as the worst crisis since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

The US, Europe and Japan are currently in recession and are expected to show negative growth for the year 2009 as a whole. Global financial markets remain clogged with very high levels of risk perception. Capital flows to emerging markets have been choked.

A global crisis of this magnitude was bound to affect India and it has. Export demand has contracted. The stock market has come down sharply, as it has all over the world, posing severe financing difficulties, in addition to the hardship caused to individual stock holders. Traditional sources of finance have dried up.

The governments of the industrialised world are well aware of the seriousness of the crisis and are taking an unprecedented series of proactive steps to counter the recession. Our government has also taken a number of steps to counter the global downturn. We have relaxed monetary policy in a series of steps since October 2008. We are encouraging the banks, especially the public sector banks, to lend more freely to help otherwise viable production units to cope with the temporary stress of the economic downturn. Steps have also been taken to allow a greater flow of credit to the non bank finance companies which have become an important part of our financial system.

Special efforts have been made to expand credit to small and medium industry and to sectors such as housing and automobiles which are especially hit.

These steps in monetary and credit policy have been supplemented by measures to ease restrictions on commercial borrowing abroad.

We have also taken major steps in fiscal policy to give a stimulus to the economy. Tax rates have been reduced in a number of areas. Budgetary provisions made for expenditure in a number of schemes in the current fiscal year have been substantially increased. These increases are largely for the development of much needed infrastructure in rural and urban areas.

Infrastructure development through Public Private Partnership based on competitive bidding has been an important part of our strategy. However, these projects will now face a difficult financing environment. To deal with this problem, a new mechanism for providing refinancing through the India Infrastructure Financing Company Ltd. has been announced. IIFCL will provide low cost refinancing to banks against long term loans provided by the banks for competitively bid infrastructure projects.

Exporters are another group that are directly impacted by the global downturn. We have paid special attention to their needs. Various export incentive schemes have been strengthened and export credit facilities have been enhanced.

The range of steps taken within a few weeks is unprecedented. Nevertheless, I recognise that they do not take care of all problems. This is because domestic policy action cannot completely negate the effect of a global downturn as severe as the one we face today. We can at best minimise its negative impact. There will be a full recovery to our normal economic potential, but this will take place when the global economy reaches normalcy.

Meanwhile, growth in the current year will be lower than last year. GDP grew by 7.7% in the first half of 2008-09. It will be much lower in the second half of the year. The latest estimates for the final outcome in 2008-09 vary between 6.5 and 7 percent. The exact figure is not critical. The important point is that although growth is lower it is still much higher than most other countries. Furthermore our agricultural sector is doing well. The brunt of the recession is being felt in the areas which had seen rapid growth earlier. This imposes pain, but hopefully these sectors are more able to cope with temporary difficulties.

I must also emphasise that our problems will not be over in the current year. The difficult period will continue into 2009-10. The Government will plan on continuing its efforts for a supporting environment next year also. Both monetary and fiscal policy will have to be tailored to that objective.

Fortunately, the rate of inflation has eased considerably. Inflation is now 5.2% and is expected to decline further. This gives ample flexibility for monetary policy.

On the fiscal side, our space is limited. The fiscal deficit in the current fiscal year will be much higher than originally planned. This is not something to be tolerated indefinitely. However, we will have to tolerate a high fiscal deficit for the next year to accommodate expenditure needed to stimulate the economy. This expenditure should be mainly in infrastructure development and in schemes that help support incomes of the poor.

Our business leaders in both the corporate and smaller sectors will have to cope with difficult and changing market circumstances. I am sure that they will respond to the challenge. Crises are also opportunities to reposition oneself, overcome weaknesses and be ready to resume growth as the world turns upward. The award winners of next few years will be those that have coped best with these difficult times.

Finally, let me comment on the very recent and shocking developments relating to one of the well known firms in the IT sector. The Satyam episode is a blot on our corporate image. It indicates how fraud and malfeasance in one company can inflict suffering on many and can also tarnish India's image more broadly. The Government is determined to unravel the full nature of the fraud and to punish those involved under the due process of law.

I would also urge Indian corporate leaders, many of whom are assembled here, to look closely into their operations to ensure that their systems are fully operational and fraudulent activity is as effectively prevented as is humanly possible.

Corporate leaders and managements hold positions of trust for shareholders, workers, and other stake holders. Their actions have reputational impact much beyond the reputation of their companies. I seek your support in setting the highest standards for Indian industry so that the world can say that we emerged from the Satyam scandal stronger and more credible.

I have no doubt we can do it.

Let me end by once again congratulating the award winners and wishing all of you all the very best."

004. Statement by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the Partnership Summit - 2009 on the theme of "Building Partnerships in a Post-Crisis World".

New Delhi, January 19, 2009.

Shri Kamal Nath, Chairman, The Partnership Summit 2009 & Minister of Commerce & Industry

His Excellency Mr Stockwell Day, Minister of International Trade and Minister for the Asia-Pacific Gateway, Canada

Hon'ble Smt Sheila Dikshit, Chief Minister of NCT of Delhi

Mr Sunil Bharti Mittal, Immediate Past President, CII Chairman & Group Chief Executive Officer, Bharti Enterprises

Mr KV Kamath, President CII

Distinguished delegates, guests, ladies and gentlemen

I am pleased to address the Inaugural Plenary of The Partnership Summit 2009, and to share the dais with such a distinguished gathering of speakers. The Partnership Summit over the years has been an outstanding platform for thought-leaders from different walks of life. It has served well as a forum for sharing global perspectives on global concerns as well as issues and challenges facing India. I congratulate CII on the Summit which has achieved the milestone of being 15th in the series.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen

2. The world is currently experiencing a complex set of challenges that derives from a number of factors. Globalisation has aided world growth in the past two decades. At the same time, it has also contributed in the West to 'market fundamentalism' characterised by excessive deregulation and speculation. Coupled with a series of misadventures on the part of some financial institutions, this has had a cascading effect on the entire world. While examining the causes, both proximate and removed, we will have to go back quite a number of years.

3. In 1995, when the Partnership Summit was first held, world GDP was $39.4 trillion. Today, world GDP has reached $60 trillion, an increase of 50% during the 14 years. It is interesting to go into the origins of world output. In 1995, high income countries contributed two-thirds of global production, but in 2006, this came down to 59%. East Asia and Pacific region pushed its share up from 9% to 14% while South Asia's share went up from 4% to 6%. The major contributors to the change thus appear to be the two large developing economies of India and China.

4. In trade as well, growth has been strong. World trade has expanded faster than world output as economies have opened up and have instituted reforms for better integration with each other. In India for example, trade in merchandise and services is over two-fifths of GDP, a big jump from the early 1990s when it was below 15%. India has been one of the beneficiaries of globalisation, bringing up its share in world exports to just over 1%, while becoming the fastest-growing service provider on the strength of its IT sector.

5. We believe that the gains from the strong period of globalisation, though severely impacted, will not be totally negated by the global economic crisis. Most countries will find themselves better off despite the downturn than they were a few years ago. The flow of goods, services, funds, people and technology in fact will continue to be the driving factor for future growth. Therefore, the lessons that we learn from the 'economic tsunami' sweeping the world must be to preserve and protect the forces of globalisation that will allow each country to best leverage its comparative advantages for the progress of its citizens without the accompanying abject failure of regulation, supervision and oversight.

6. But to make globalisation a more effective tool for progress, we would have to identify the exact nature of what went wrong, and then try to fix it. In the run-up to the financial crisis, the world faced many unprecedented developments. For example, for many years the US economy had been living beyond its means accumulating huge deficits being funded by foreign surpluses which was unsustainable. This led many emerging economies to amass foreign exchange reserves, creating financial imbalances. Then there were the massive fluctuations in prices of primary products throughout last year. At one stage, the rise in prices of food, oil and commodities was being placed at the door of large developing economies for their voracious appetite for growth. But oil prices have come down to one-third of ruling highs, while food prices have stabilized. Steep growth in financial instruments or derivatives trading contributed to the crisis. Unbridled deregulation combined with speculative greed led to a massive regulatory and supervisory failure. All these trends will have to be examined in detail while at the same time evolving solutions for continued stability of the system.

7. It is already clear that the present crisis of historically unprecedented magnitude and scope, had its origins in the developed world. The crisis clearly bears a 'Made in the US' label. It is equally clear that the toxic assets produced in America were exported to Europe and the rest of the world. The situation has been further aggravated by the fact that large parts of the developed world are already in recession. Thus the origin and the responsibility for the crisis rest squarely with the developed countries. Even so, emerging economies like India cannot remain isolated and insulated; they must be a part of the solution through an inclusive approach. Emerging economies need to have a greater role and say in global financial matters to reflect contemporary realities. Accordingly, India has been fully engaged in the global exercise to address and overcome this crisis in an effective and urgent manner. This is also consistent with our commitment to pursue India's rightful place in the comity of nations, be it the UN Security Council or the international financial institutions.

8. India remains committed to playing a prominent role in global negotiations and is seen as the voice for the developing world. We are a participant in the G-20 deliberations on the future of the financial system. We look forward to taking a proactive and constructive part in shaping the contours of the emerging system of global financial governance. The issues of surveillance and monitoring, identification of potential threats, tracking of developments to measure their impact, and stabilization will have to be addressed. The Bretton Woods institutions have been criticized for their slow response and their failure to raise the red flag. The management of these archaic institutions lies with the developed countries and this may have led to their being part of the problem. These institutions therefore must be made more responsive and more sensitive to the needs of the developing economies. It is evident to all that the international financial institutions are in need of far-reaching and comprehensive reforms by way of democratisation, transparency, etc. for effective surveillance, oversight and regulation. I am confident that the global crisis will trigger fresh thinking on the way the world meets emerging challenges. The institutions constituting the new financial architecture must reflect contemporary realities, with countries like India having their due representation and weight in these institutions.

9. Apart from the financial system, the world will also have to develop new partnerships to address global threats. The expansion of the UN Security Council has been discussed for many years, but needs to move into action. India seeks its rightful place in an expanded Security Council.

10. Terrorism is one threat that affects many of us. India has long faced the scourge of terrorist activities. The attacks on Mumbai shocked the world and focused attention on the challenges faced by India in countering cross-border terrorism. International partnerships by way of sharing and analysis of intelligence are crucial components of anti-terrorist operations. The mechanisms for these operations must be reworked so that all countries have access to sophisticated technology for tackling terror. At the same time, sufficient security must be ensured to prevent such intelligence from falling into the wrong hands. We in India are strengthening and upgrading our anti-terrorist strategies. Our diplomatic efforts to diminish the terrorist threats will continue unabated. We look to build partnerships with our interlocutors on counter-terrorism to root out the menace of terrorism. In practical terms, this means that countries that sponsor or tolerate terrorism must be left with no choice but to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism. This also implies that countries found wanting in their commitment to zero tolerance for terrorism will be made to pay a heavy price by the international community bound together in a steadfast partnership against terrorism.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen

11. In conclusion, this Partnership Summit 2009 comes at an opportune and timely moment; its theme 'Building Partnerships in a post-crisis world' is appropriate and topical. I have no doubt that this Partnership Summit forum will, during its deliberations today and tomorrow, seize the opportunities being thrown up by the challenges posed. Far-reaching change is inevitable; the momentum appears unstoppable. The stage is set for a global, inclusive and calibrated response involving comprehensive reforms of the existing institutions as an interim measure in the short run. At the same time, we need to look at devising new institutions to be put in place for a new global financial architecture in the medium term. In this effort, India appears to be well placed, pursuing a positive reform agenda, to be a worthy and meaningful partner in a post-crisis world.

12. I urge the present congregation to deliberate on some of these key challenges and evolve possible solutions. I wish your Partnership Summit 2009 all success.

Thank you.

005. Talk by Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon on India's Foreign Policy at the Delhi University.

Delhi, January 19, 2009.

Prof. Deepak Paintal, Vice Chancellor, University of Delhi.

Dr. S.K. Tandon, Pro-Vice Chancellor, University of Delhi.

Thank you for asking me to speak to you today on India's Foreign Policy. It is an honour and intimidating to be asked back to one's alma mater. It has been thirty-nine years since I left Delhi University and it is impressive that it looks much better than my memory of it.

I thought that I would try to discuss what foreign policy is, then speak of independent India's experience of conducting foreign policy, and finally try to foresee what our foreign policy may look like in future. After that I would be most interested in hearing your views and comments.

What is Foreign Policy?

The hardest question for a professional diplomat like me to answer is, "What is it that you actually do?" The simple answer is that we implement the country's foreign policy. Which invariably invites the question, "What is foreign policy?"

Perhaps the simplest definition of foreign policy is that it is the attempt by a state to maximize its national interest in the external or international environment. Even this simple definition suggests some of the complexity of this attempt. The definition assumes a commonly agreed definition of the national interest in the country. This is not always true. Secondly, foreign policy is an ends and means problem, a problem of achieving certain national goals with the limited means available. Unlike domestic policy, the attempt to attain one's goals has to be made in an environment which is largely outside of one's own control. Thirdly, and again unlike domestic policy, this attempt is made in competition with other states who are seeking the same goals for themselves, sometimes at your expense. For instance, if any one state in the international system attains absolute security for itself, there would be absolute insecurity for every other state in the world. So merely maximizing one's own interest competitively will not suffice. One needs to include some measure of cooperation, or at least of alliance building or working together. Of the two basic goals of the state, security and prosperity, one, security, is often presented as a zero sum game. The other, prosperity, requires states to cooperate with each other. Both goals can therefore pull one's foreign policy in opposite directions.

And this competition and cooperation with other states to maximize one's own interests takes place in a perpetually changing external environment and while the states themselves gain and lose relative and absolute power. As they change, states change or modify their definitions of national interest. Even the domestic mainsprings of external policy shift. Some factors that one expects to remain constant undergo change. History is redefined continuously by all political systems. And immutable facts of geography are made less or more relevant by advances in technology and ideology. This is why attempts to analyze foreign policy require the use of dynamic concepts like the balance of power, game theory, and such like.

For a practitioner or diplomat, it is in the analysis and working of these changes that the opportunities, threats and joys of diplomacy and foreign policy lie. My generation has been fortunate in having lived through the fastest ever period of change in India's history. For a diplomat, it has been an amazing transformation of India, its place in the world, and the foreign policy that we can now aspire to practice.

Let us look at the Indian foreign policy experience.

The Beginnings

There have been diplomats and diplomacy since time immemorial. By some accounts Hanuman was our first Ambassador to Sri Lanka and Krishna one of our first known envoys. But foreign policy as it is now understood is a function of the modern state system. One can therefore legitimately speak of late medieval Indian foreign policy. But just when the modern Westphalian state system, based on the nation state, came into existence in the eighteenth century, India was losing the attributes of sovereignty and her capacity for an independent foreign policy. So long as India was not an independent actor on the world stage, imperial British interests prevailed over Indian interests. When strong personalities like Curzon tried to assert what they saw as Indian interests, as he did in 1904 by sending Younghusband on his Tibetan expedition, London rapidly reined him in, forcing him to give up his gains in the Chumbi valley and Tibet in order to preserve the overall British interest in keeping China on her side against the Russians. So, while the Government of India had a Foreign and Political Department from 1834 onwards, its primary functions were to deal with the Indian princes, (as representative of the paramount power), and to handle British-Indian commercial and mercantile interests in the Gulf and the immediate neighborhood of India.

The unintended benefit from this absence of an indigenous foreign policy tradition became apparent when the freedom movement began to think of national issues. As early as 1927 it was possible for Jawaharlal Nehru to start describing a purely Indian view of the world. In July 1938, when it was highly unfashionable to do so, he was speaking of both fascism and imperialism in the same breath, refusing to choose between them, and to start saying what India's foreign policy would be. By January 1947, these thoughts had coalesced in a letter to KPS Menon into a doctrine, non-alignment, which seemed best designed to meet independent India's needs in the bipolar world she found herself in. Nehru said:

"Our general policy is to avoid entanglement in power politics and not to join any group of powers as against any other group. The two leading groups today are the Russian bloc and the Anglo-American bloc. We must be friends to both and yet not join either. Both America and Russia are extraordinarily suspicious of each other as well as of other countries. This makes our path difficult and we may well be suspected by each of leaning towards the other. This cannot be helped."

At Independence

When India became independent in 1947, our economy had not grown for over fifty years, while population was growing at over 3% a year. The average Indian could expect to live for 26 years, and only 14% of Indians could read. What had once been one of the richest, most advanced and industrialized nations in the world had been reduced by two centuries of colonialism into one of the poorest and most backward countries, de-industrialized and stagnant. From accounting along with China for two-thirds of world industrial production in 1750, by 1947 India's share of world industrial product was negligible.

It was therefore natural and clear that the primary purpose of independent India's foreign policy was to enable the domestic transformation of India from a poor and backward society into one which could offer its people their basic needs and an opportunity to achieve their potential. And this had to be attempted in the Cold War world, divided between two heavily armed and hostile camps, each led by a superpower, and each saying that if you were not with them you were against them. It took courage and vision to choose, as Nehru and the leadership did then, not to join either camp and to opt for non-alignment, to retain the choice to judge each issue on its merits and on how it affected India's interests rather than those of an alliance or its leaders. Having fought so hard for our freedom, we were not ready to abdicate our independence of judgment to others.

India's immediate foreign policy objectives in 1947 were therefore a peaceful environment, strategic space and autonomy, free of entanglement in Cold War conflicts or alliances, while we concentrated on our domestic tasks of integration and nation building. Non-alignment, as this policy came to be called was the ability to judge issues on their merits and their effect on India's interests or, as our first Prime Minister Nehru used to say, 'enlightened self-interest'. Indian nationalism has not been based on a shared language or common religion or ethnic identity. As we sought to build a plural, democratic, secular and tolerant society of our own, it was natural that we would look for and promote the same values abroad.

Our foreign policy experience can probably be divided into three broad roughly twenty year periods: 1950-1971, 1971-1991 and 1991 onwards till today.

1950-1971

Non-alignment as a policy was a practical and strategic choice, but was soon put to the test by the alliances. It was denounced by John Foster Dulles as immoral, and Stalin had strong words to say about it too. Our neighbours were rapidly enrolled in the competing alliance systems - China by the Soviet Union and Pakistan by the US.

Our attempt was to enlarge the area of peace, of those states willing to coexist peacefully despite ideological and other differences, enabling us to concentrate on our own development. Hence the very early summoning of the Asian Relations Conference in New Delhi in March 1947, our activism at the Bandung Afro-Asian conference, our reliance on the UN, and the institutionalization of the Non-Aligned movement in the sixties.

Throughout this early period, our means were limited, our goals were primarily domestic, and our aspirations were local. The foreign policy challenges that we faced, such as having a border with China for the first time in our history after China moved into Tibet, could not be addressed with any tools other than diplomacy because of the simple fact that we had no others. Our primary focus was domestic, and at no stage in this period did we spend more than 3% of our GDP on defence. It was this desire to escape external distractions that accounts for some of the tactical choices in handling issues like the India-China boundary, resulting in the short but sharp and salutary conflict of 1962.

Our preoccupations were with the consequences of Partition and the uniquely complicated birth of the independent Indian state. The J&K issue itself, which was with us from the birth of the Republic of India, was one consequence of that birth. One of our first tasks was also to compress into a few years what history takes centuries to do for most other states - agreeing and settling boundaries with our neighbours. In a major diplomatic achievement, we agreed all our land boundaries except those with China (and with Pakistan and our state of J&K) within thirty years. We have also agreed all our maritime boundaries except for those with Pakistan in Sir Creek and Bangladesh.

By the early seventies, the steady development of India, (which even at 3.5% p.a. was faster than that achieved by Britain for most of her industrial revolution), had created capacities and relative strengths that were dramatically revealed in the 1971 war. The liberation of Bangladesh was equally a liberation for India. For the first time in centuries, India had on her own and without relying on external imperial power crafted a political outcome in our neighborhood, despite the opposition of a superpower and a large and militarized neighbor. That we could do so was also tribute to Mrs. Indira Gandhi's political skills and willingness to take risks. The diplomatic task was primarily to hold the ring internationally by winning over public opinion for a just cause and averting actions by others which would prevent us from assisting the birth of Bangladesh.

Soon thereafter, in 1974 India tested a nuclear explosive device, in what was described as a peaceful nuclear explosion (PNE). The world led by the Nuclear Weapon States reacted by forming a nuclear cartel, the Nuclear Suppliers Group (NSG), and by cutting off nuclear cooperation with India unless she agreed to forego a nuclear weapons programme and put all her nuclear facilities under international safeguards to guarantee that commitment. As the nuclear weapon states were not willing to do the same themselves, we refused to do so, suffering the consequences of technology denial regimes for our growth and development. But at that stage we lacked the relative power or capability to do more than to suffer in silence while keeping our options open. (This in itself was more than most other states managed).

The true realization of our foreign policy potential had to wait for the end of the bipolar world in 1989 and our economic reform policies, opening up the Indian economy to the world. Historically speaking, India has been most prosperous and stable when she has been most connected with the rest of the world.

In many ways, the period after 1991 has been the most favorable to our quest to develop India. The post Cold War external environment of a globalizing world, without rival political alliances, gave India the opportunity to improve relations with all the major powers. The risk of a direct conflict between two or more major powers had also diminished due to the interdependence created by globalization. And the strength of capital and trade flows was directly beneficial to emerging economies like India, China and others. We saw the evolving situation as one in which there is an opportunity for India. The consistent objective of our foreign policy was and remains poverty eradication and rapid and inclusive economic development. If we are to eradicate mass poverty by 2020, we need to keep growing our economy at 8-10% each year. This requires a peaceful and supportive global environment in general and a peaceful periphery in particular. The period since 1991 has therefore seen a much more active Indian engagement with the neighbours, whether through repeated attempts by successive governments to improve relations with Pakistan, or the border related CBMs with China, or free trade agreements with neighbours starting with Sri Lanka in 1998.

The period since 1991 has been a period of remarkable change in the scale of our ambitions, and in our capacity to seek to achieve them. The international situation made possible the rapid development of our relationships with each of the major powers. Equally important was another necessary condition which gave India space to work in: India's rapid economic and social transformation. As a result of twenty five years of 6% growth and our reforms since 1991, India is today in a position to engage with the world in an unprecedented manner. Our engagement with the global economy is growing rapidly, with trade in goods and services now exceeding US$ 330 billion. Our needs from the world have changed, as has our capability. India can do and consider things that we could not do or consider twenty years ago. This is reflected in how India perceives its own future, its ties with its neighbourhood and its approach to the larger international order.

The contrast between the world's reaction to the 1974 and 1998 nuclear tests is instructive. And finally in 2008 we were able not only to break out of our nuclear isolation but to rewrite the rules in our favour by working with others to enable the NSG decision permitting international civil nuclear cooperation with India.

Today's World

Today, however, it seems that we may be on the cusp of another change in the nature of the world situation. Looking at the world from India, it often seems that we are witness to the collapse of the Westphalian state system and a redistribution in the global balance of power leading to the rise of major new powers and forces. The twin processes of the world economic crisis and economic inter-dependence have resulted in a situation where Cold War concepts like containment have very little relevance and where no power is insulated from global developments. The interdependence brought about by globalization imposes limits beyond which tensions among the major powers are unlikely to escalate. But equally, no one power can hope to solve issues by itself, no matter how powerful it is. What seems likely, and is in fact happening in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, is that major powers come together to form coalitions to deal with issues where they have a convergence of interests, despite differences on other issues or in broader approach. In other words, what we see is the emergence of a global order marked by the preponderance of several major powers, with minimal likelihood of direct conflict amongst these powers, but where both cooperation and competition among them are intense. The result is a de-hyphenation of relationships with each other, of each major power engaging with and competing with all the others, in a situation that might perhaps be described as "general un-alignment".

Paradoxically, some of the same forces of globalization - the evolution of technology, the mobility of capital and so on - which have led to the decline or collapse of the Westphalian state order are also the source of our greatest dangers. Our major threats today are from non-state actors, from trans-boundary effects of the collapse of the state system, or, at least, of its inadequacy. (Paradoxically, the doctrine of absolute sovereignty created by the strong European states and rulers in earlier centuries is now the last defence of the weak against the strong.)

Looking ahead, the real factors of risk that threaten systemic stability come from larger, global issues like terrorism, energy security and environmental and climate change. With globalization and the spread of technology, threats have also globalised and now span borders. These are issues that will impact directly on India's ability to grow and expand our strategic autonomy. It is also obvious that no single country can deal with these issues alone. They require global solutions.

International Terrorism

Among these global threats, international terrorism remains a major threat to peace and stability. We in India have directly suffered the consequences of the linkages and relationships among terrorist organizations, support structures and funding mechanisms, centered upon our immediate neighborhood, and transcending national borders. Any compromise with such forces, howsoever pragmatic or opportune it might appear momentarily, only encourages the forces responsible for terrorism. Large areas abutting India to the west have seen the collapse of state structures and the absence of governance or the writ of the state, with the emergence of multiple centres of power. The results, in the form of terrorism, extremism and radicalism are felt by us all in India.

Energy Security

As for energy security, this is one issue which combines an ethical challenge to all societies with an opportunity to provide for the energy so necessary for development. For India, clean, convenient and affordable energy is a critical necessity if we are to improve the lives of our people. Today, India's per-capita energy consumption is less than a third of the global average. (Our per capita consumption is only 500 kgoe compared to a global average of nearly 1800 kgoe). For India a rapid increase in energy use per capita is imperative to realize our national development goals.

Global warming and climate change require all societies to work together. While the major responsibility for the accumulation of green house gasses in the atmosphere lies with the developed countries, its adverse affects are felt most severely by developing countries like India. When we speak of 'shared responsibility', it must include the international community's shared responsibility to ensure the right to development of the developing countries. Development is the best form of adaptation to climate change.

What we seek is equitable burden-sharing. We have made it clear that India will not exceed the average of per capita GHG emissions by the industrialized countries, as we continue to pursue the growth and development that our people need.

Also, the transfer and access to clean technologies by developing countries, as global public goods on the lines of what was done for retrovirals to fight AIDS, is essential to effectively limit future GHG emissions. The IPR regime should include collaborative R&D and the sharing of the resulting IPRs.

The Future

I have tried to show you how great the change and flux in India's foreign policy has been within my own lifetime. In 1948, waving expansively at a map of the world, Nehru exclaimed to a young Indian Foreign Service officer, "We will have forty missions around the world!". Today we have one hundred and sixteen Embassies abroad.

If our foreign policy experience teaches us one thing it is that change is inevitable and rapid. There is hardly an international boundary between two states that is where it was two hundred years ago. The speed of the rise of China and India in the last quarter of the twentieth century is proof of the rapidity of change. Since the balance of power is relative, small shifts have exaggerated effects on the international system.

India's foreign policy today no longer deals only with existential threats to our security or with subsistence issues. Today our future will be determined by how effectively we adapt to change, and how we deal with cross-cutting global issues, with questions of energy security, water, low carbon growth, technology issues and so on. An open rule-based trading system is in our interest now that we have sizeable equities in international trade. We have moved from statements alone to working for and crafting desirable outcomes.

After several centuries, once again the state is not the sole or necessarily the predominant actor in the international system. In some cases, like technology, for instance, it is businesses and individuals who now determine the future, and it is these units that a successful foreign policy must now increasingly deal with.

If we are to deal with this new world and new issues, it is essential that we begin to develop our own culture and tradition of strategic thought. So long as India's situation and needs are unique, it becomes essential that we develop our own strategic culture, vocabulary and doctrine. Fortunately for us, there is no isolationist streak in our strategic thought so far. As I have said before, India's best periods in history have been when we were most connected to the world. Ironically, the greater our capabilities, the more we need the world and are integrated into it. So if anything, the joys and challenges of Indian foreign policy will only grow with time.

Thank you

006. Key Note Address by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at 'Delhi Dialogue' organised by Federation of Indian Chamber of Commerce and Industry.

New Delhi, January 21, 2009.

Your Excellency, Dr. Surin Pitsuwan, Secretary General, ASEAN,

Your Excellency Mr. OK Darariddh, Under Secretary of State of Tourism of the Kingdom of Cambodia,

Ambassador K. Kesavapany, Director, Institute of South East Asian Studies, Singapore,

Shri Rajeev Chandrasekhar, President, FICCI,

Dr. Amit Mitra, Secretary General FICCI,

Distinguished participants of the Delhi Dialogue,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

Let me, at the outset, thank the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce & Industry, for inviting me as the keynote speaker at its inaugural session. This dialogue on cooperation and regional security with our ASEAN friends is being supported by the Institute of South East Asian Studies, Singapore, and the SAEA Group Research, Singapore.

Growing linkages between India and ASEAN countries - civilizational, economic, intellectual and societal - have taken on a momentum which is palpably accelerating. Our bilateral trade, which was US $ 2.5 billion in 1993-94, crossed US$ 38 billion in 2007-08 and is expected to reach US$ 50 billion by 2010 - a target set at the India-ASEAN Summit in Singapore. It is remarkable that this impressive growth has taken place even before the India-ASEAN FTA in goods, has come into effect. Our ongoing cooperation embraces a vast spectrum of governmental as well as non-governmental activities with a special focus on programmes to cover the widest segment of our societies in terms of capacity building and human resource development. We are participating actively in the Initiatives for ASEAN Integration, launched by ASEAN to bridge the intra-ASEAN development gaps. We are focusing on collaborating in vital areas such as health care, disaster management, R&D and technology development, among others. We are also working together for increasing our tourist exchanges.

Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

ASEAN has now adopted a Charter. With this, the ASEAN organisation is developing the mechanism to achieve much greater economic and political cohesion amongst the member states. ASEAN's rising stature will have a beneficial effect on global affairs both geo-strategically as well as economically because of its stabilising influence in these fluid times. It is the growing and strong linkages between us which underlie the decision by the Government of India to appoint an Ambassador to the ASEAN. It is my pleasure to inform that Mr. N. Ravi, Secretary(East), Ministry of External Affairs, has now been appointed as our next Ambassador to ASEAN.

This seminar has taken on a new meaning altogether in our complex times when the world is beset with an unprecedented economic crisis - the worst in nearly 75 years - affecting all of us in varying degrees of intensity. As Roger C. Altman, a former US Treasury official put it, in a recent 'Foreign Affairs' article, the Anglo-Saxon brand of market-based capitalism is, now, under a cloud. The apparent marginal role of the global financial institutions established after the Bretton-Woods Conference demonstrates both the unprecedented scale of the crisis and perhaps calls into question the anachronistic nature of these institutions to handle them in the future, in their present form.

A steady friendship that we have developed since our first engagement with ASEAN as a sectoral partner eighteen years ago will play a critical role in coping with these still developing challenges. The situation provides both a challenge as well as an opportunity, reflected in the evolution of an Asian response to this crisis, by developing its own model of inclusive economic growth.

As our relationship grows, so would our inter-dependence. This would be beneficial to both sides because our economies have, fortunately, not been so badly affected as the western ones; ASEAN nations met the challenges of the 1997-98 crisis well and has ensured that there are adequate currency reserves to cope with such crises in the future.

Excellencies,

Asia holds the bulk of the world's savings and Asians show one of world's best savings rates. Even the 1997-98 crisis was caused by the fickleness of certain international investors which then wrought havoc in the region. I should add that many of the security problems in the South-east Asian region can be traced back to the mishandling of the economic crisis of the 1997-98 by leading financial institutions. We therefore need to handle the current economic crisis in a far-sighted manner.

I believe that our inter-linkages provide the basis for exploring the possibility of regional financial arrangements which will mitigate the growing risks from the current negative economic outlook.

The recent steps such as the India-Malaysia Capital Market Forum, jointly organised by the Securities and Exchange Board of India (SEBI) and the Securities Commission of Malaysia, which met in November, 2008, in Mumbai are a good development. The strengthening of the Chiang Mai Initiative and the Asian Bond Market is another, given the currency reserves held by the countries of the region. I believe that India will both benefit from and contribute to financial cooperation in Asia: it will meet our enormous demand for investment in infrastructure development and will contribute towards relative stability of exchange rate and, also facilitate regional trade.

Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

The trend towards inter-connectedness needs to grow much more. Energy demands are going to grow in the emerging markets and indeed in much of Asia. This requirement is complicated by price volatility, potential supply instability and rising energy costs. The ASEAN region has oil, gas, coal, hydro, bio-mass and geo-thermal resources. A carefully calibrated strategy can help our region to grow on an ecologically sustainable basis and through diversified economic and trade linkages which is the best way to cushion ourselves from the energy security point of view. I am pleased to note that within the East Asia Summit mechanism, this issue is being addressed comprehensively. Simultaneous attainment of energy security, market rationalisation and environmental preservation in Asia requires the best "energy mix" for each country. India's own energy linkages with the ASEAN member states have enormous potential for our relationship to get even deeper.

Another aspect of this growing inter-connectedness is physical infrastructure and the logistics of the movement of goods and services. I am aware that, within the ASEAN region, considerable work has been done which is spurring the region's economic growth. I believe that better connectivity between India and ASEAN would unlock the growth potential our two regions for reasons that are self-evident. On this score, the progress has been rather modest and the faster it is the more dramatic the results for our cooperation would be - the India-ASEAN car rally four years ago showed this quite vividly. The Kaladan project, the trilateral India-Myanmar-Thailand transport link and the Delhi-Hanoi rail link are three very important projects which will facilitate inter-connectivity between South East Asia and onward to West Asia and beyond. We need to move faster on all fronts - maritime, aviation, rail and road. I am glad that some preliminary work has taken place already and more is envisaged. ERIA (the Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia), of which the Indian think-tank RIS is a member, is engaged in conceptualizing east-west transport and industrial corridor. This is a promising prospect for our deepening cooperation.

Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

To sustain the promise of progress, we all need a peaceful environment. As the recent brutal terrorist attacks in Mumbai have shown, both India and ASEAN will need to resolutely rebuff such evil attempts that strike at our common civilizational roots. Our growing economic and political links will send a message that the terrorists' designs will have to be defeated not just by India but by the international community as a whole. Terrorism is not just the act of misguided individuals. Since 9/11 the magnitude, depth and audacity of terror acts, as once again manifested in Mumbai attacks, demonstrate that this is no longer a problem of a state or of a region but of the whole world. This problem becomes more acute when it becomes state sponsored. Recalcitrant state must be brought to discipline by various international measures.

Friends, what I have stated above is not a blue print but a vision of what our relationship should be. If we conserve and marshal our resources, this is not a dream but a realistic future for all of us with all its attendant benefits for the vast populations of both our regions - a population which has proven to be enterprising, creative and industrious. This growth would be sustainable and inclusive and counter the many challenges which beset them. It is also the answer to the threat posed by reckless globalisation.

We have great interest, therefore, in the outcome of your forthcoming deliberations. They will be useful as policy inputs for the governments of India and the ASEAN member states. My compliments to FICCI, to the Singapore Institute of South East Asian Studies and the SAEA Group Research. I offer special welcome to His Excellency, Dr. Surin Pitsuwan, to His Excellency Mr. Ok Darariddh, to Ambassador Kesavapany and many other friends from the ASEAN countries for success in their endeavours.

Thank you

007. Interview of External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee with the Chief Editor of the Indian Express Shekhar Gupta in the NDTV-TV programme Walk-the-Talk.

[The interview was telecast in two parts and excerpts from it were published in the Indian Express on February 2 and February 9, 2009.]

[Hello and welcome to Walk the Talk. My guest today is the busiest man in our public life and perhaps one of the busiest in public life anywhere in the world. A man who needs his mind to be like a nine-band radio, or who maybe needed 48 hours in a day. Pranab Mukherjee, welcome to Walk the Talk.]

Thank you.

- So, how many hours do you have in your day?

I wish if it could have been extended a little. Then I could have coped with things better.

- Because you do more jobs than anybody can think of.

No, I do not know. There are some busy persons. I was told Karunanidhi, even at this age, works very hard. His life is very disciplined.

- Your life is very busy and very disciplined as well.

More or less. You can say that.

- You are very punctual too, and I believe you have very low patience with anybody who is not punctual.

I try to be punctual but not always. Earlier, I was more punctual because you know the basic discipline which we have got from Indira Gandhi. She was very punctual. We used to tally our watch with her schedule. When she was engaged in her work and the Cabinet meeting was due, she would send a slip to me, saying you take the innocuous routine items, I will join you.

- There is something she once said that I was reading somewhere. She said if you say something to Pranab

Mukherjee, it remains with him. Then even if you punch him in the stomach, all that comes out is smoke.

(Laughs) That was a beautiful comment.

- So, now even smoke won't come out as you have stopped smoking. Do you have any other memories of Indira Gandhi?

Yeah, yeah, a lot of memories. I can tell you the way she was thorough in every respect and she gave a lot of weightage to the views of others, our Cabinet colleagues. At the same time she wouldn't like that somebody would go on rambling. She would expect people to be precise, to the point and confine to the subject.

- And if anybody started story-telling?

Then she would immediately say that's not the issue. The issue is something else. It's mainly the Cabinet secretary who introduces the subject in the Cabinet meeting these days but during Indira Gandhi's time — I served twice under her leadership between '74 and '77 and between '80 and '84 till she died — the ministers were to introduce the subject. If the Minister was not prepared or satisfied, then only the departmental secretary was asked to come. The Cabinet Secretary's job was to help the Prime Minister.

- A genuine clerk of the Cabinet, as the job was defined those days.

Nowadays the Cabinet Secretary reads every paper, every brief and, primarily, he conducts the business but, of course, under the supervision of the Prime Minister.

- She was also tough and she could be unforgiving.

I don't know whether she could be unforgiving but the fact of the matter is that she always expected people to be thoroughly ready and prepared.

- You saw her lose patience with somebody?

Of course, a number of times, even with me.

- Tell us about it.

In Calcutta Congress, we had a very tight schedule. She asked me to move the economic resolution, I was Finance Minister then. She told me "Pranab, time is very limited, you will have to confine your observations within 25-27 minutes". I told her that "Madam, I would do it" but unfortunately, I couldn't. She did not want to disturb me in the middle of my speech but the moment I finished my speech, I went to her and said "Madam I am sorry, I have exceeded time". Her retort was very cold. She said "yes, you should be sorry because it was not expected of you".

- Times have changed. From having powerful Prime Ministers who everybody deferred to as a party man too, now the Prime Minister's job is to manage very complex coalitions.

Of course, a very complex coalition. We do not have a clear majority in the House but here the great advantage Dr Manmohan Singh has is his soothing personality, his vast knowledge of economics, and he is not irritated at all. It's a great quality.

- Sometimes he is. It takes a lot to irritate him.

Yes, it takes a lot to irritate him. (laughs) I agree with you on this.

- You like to quote from Hamlet, I think, to describe Dr Singh.

Right. Once I told him in Parliament, maybe in Lok Sabha: "Be aware of the fury of a quiet man". He is a quiet man but once he becomes furious... though he has never become furious...

- But in the last four-and-a-half years, have you ever seen him furious or irritated? Has something got to him?

Irritated, sometimes maybe, as I sit next to him but he never expressed it, he controls himself.

- During the days of the nuclear deal?

No, he was very patient. Sometimes, he used to say when the people were totally irrational and say Parliament was not taken into confidence. One day, he quietly asked me, "Pranabji, how many times this debate has been discussed in Parliament, this issue has been debated in Parliament?" I said four-five times. He asked me if any other foreign policy at any point of time had been debated so many times, as "you remember a lot of history". I said no... that is between him and me in the House.

- Yet he managed with the Left for almost four years, more than four years. It would tax anybody's patience because you knew their views were so far apart.

So divergent but I must say that the Left also recognises this fact... they have their compulsions. From the very beginning they could have said no, but they did not... they did not gauge the US Congress and US political establishment.

- But the fact of the matter is that if they wanted to just withdraw support, they could have done that immediately.

Apart from nine meetings which we had formally, several times I had an informal chat — almost an equal number or maybe more — with Karat and Yechury.

- In one of those, you also lost your cool, I remember.

Yes, that was at a meeting with, I think, an RSP representative.

- Chandrachuran.

Yes, Chandrachuran. He wanted that our approach should reflect in the statement. Normally, myself and Sitaram Yechury used to come and brief the media waiting outside my house. Because my house is small, I could not accommodate them inside. Nor was there any room as I have only one drawing room. So, they had to wait outside. After the meeting, we used to draft a small statement. Both of us would come and just read it out. Normally, Sitaram would also speak Hindi as he is good at the language. But on that occasion, he wanted that what we were saying, what was our objection should also come out. That cannot be done, in that case there is no joint statement. If you expect that your thing should come then why not mine.

- And the other time we thought you were on the verge of losing your cool was in Parliament when you said non-state actors don't come from heaven or from another planet.

(Laughs) Yeah, I became a bit angry because it was stated repeatedly that these attacks were carried out by the non-state actors. Then I said they were coming from some place after all. They are not coming from a different planet or from heaven.

- Were you angry those days, following 26/11?

I was shocked. I must say I was shocked and I felt there would be no end to it. That was my first impression.

- When you say you thought that this would not end, you thought the terror attack would not end?

No, what I thought was that these types of terrorist attacks emanating from Pakistan won't end. The information which we got by that time set me thinking, and one after another events started coming to my mind. Vajpayee showed a good gesture when he went to Lahore. After Lahore, Kargil came. Then the relationship was cold. On the sidelines of the SAARC — I think it was January 6, 2004 — President Musharraf made a comment that Pakistani territory won't be allowed to be used by terrorists to attack India. The business resumed, and it was going well. Then again after the attack on Delhi, we had to suspend the composite dialogue. After that, when the Prime Minister went to Havana to join the Non-aligned Movement, President Musharraf suggested that something needed to be done. Then a joint anti-terror mechanism was established... again after sometime, somebody will come and say "let us do something". Where is the end to it? That is the question which went on haunting me.

- This is a self-perpetuating cycle.

Yes, and it is on till now. Where is the end to it? It is not that I am not aware of the complexities of Pakistan administration, Pakistan society, their system but my problem is that I am accountable to the people of this country. I am accountable to Indians, to the people of India. What would be my answer to them if they ask how long? Is there any respite from it? So that's the issue.

- So, what you are saying is that your compulsions we understand, but your compulsions cannot become our compulsions.

No, every country has its own problems but it should be ensured that those problems are not transferred to the others. That is the responsibility of the state.

- And it's no explanation, that these are non-state actors.

Exactly. Non-state actors are coming from certain areas. And nowhere in the world except the artificial no-man's- land, every inch of the arch is divided amongst member states, sovereign states.

- Right, so this is no excuse. That it is stateless.

Yes, this is no excuse.

- So, when you said this time it is serious...

No, no what I said was that expect Pakistan to do three things. One, the terror camps, infrastructural facilities, and training camps — all these need to be dismantled. No infrastructural facilities should be made available within the territory of Pakistan, or within the territory under the control of Pakistan.

- That means including Pakistan-occupied Kashmir.

That is one aspect; the second aspect is that you must give demonstrable punishment to the perpetrators of the terror attacks. These are simple things and I am not asking for anything which they cannot do legally. They have passed an Extradition Act. Though there is no treaty between India and Pakistan, nothing prevents them from handing over the perpetrators to us who have committed a crime in India and have taken shelter there, including Masood Azhar. He was in Indian custody; he was released by the hijackers and we have never said that Pakistan is responsible for the hijacking as it took place in Kathmandu in Nepal. The exchange took place in Kandahar, Afghanistan. But how do I explain to the people of India when these persons are given some sort of hero's welcome in Pakistan and that too is coming on the television screen? And the entire faux pas... first, we are told that he is under house arrest, then we are told that he is not visible. It is not possible for anybody to be under house arrest and at the same time be invisible. Either of the two is correct.

- So, what is the third thing? You said first, they should stop all camps and all infrastructure. Second, they should punish these people, and third?

Thirdly, those who have committed crime here and have taken shelter there, starting from Dawood Ibrahim, be handed over.

- You mean... those are many Indian citizens as well. So, that demand has not been suspended.

That demand is there.

- Because Pakistanis respond to it by saying you also have many Balooch leaders in India.

You tell them “you tell us. We will help you if they have committed any crime”. The type of material, information which we are giving to you, you are also expected to give us, and then there can be a fair trial.

- When you got the feeling that this is something that will go on, did the Prime Minister share that view?

The Prime Minister has his own perception on this and he is more disturbed than I am, as he genuinely wants to build good relations with Pakistan. He has invested much more political capital than anyone else. This is definitely a heart breaker.

- During the first four days, it seemed that Pakistan was responding reasonably well. President Zardari made those statements. Then things started changing. What happened?

I do not know. I cannot allow myself, holding a constitutional office, to indulge in guess work. But there was an attempt to divert the issue, even during the telephonic conversation that we had with Mr Qureshi. I did not take any chance and spoke to him over the telephone from a written text. Every word was recorded in my telephone. The PM talked to their PM, their President. What puzzles me is that ‘hoax call’. How is it possible that the Foreign Minister of one country directly calls the President of another country and particularly a person whom I have met only once? I have met Mr Zardari only once — when I went to Pakistan after their party came to power. At that time, he was not the President. I met the Prime Minister, the then President Musharraf, Mr Qureshi, my counterpart. I went to Mr Zardari’s house or his party office to pay homage to Benazir Bhutto and had a brief discussion with him. We were never so close that I could just pick up the phone and speak to the President of Pakistan.

- Moreover, in our country we observe protocols.

Exactly! For instance, when the PM suddenly became ill, the big question was what to do about certain delegation-level talks, already scheduled. So, for the first time we created a precedent by requesting the President to lead the delegation and her speech was carefully drafted. This is the position we strictly adhere to. Thus, the 'hoax call' was deliberately designed to divert attention. And here I must make a very small observation that there is no tension.

- Tension goes up when you say all options are open. Diplomatic options are there, other options are there too. But I had just said that other options are also open.
- So you do not see any tension. No troop movement? No activity on the borders?

No tension and no troop movement from our side. We haven't done anything to cause any tension.

- Can we divide Pakistan's response in three phases — first phase sounded sincere and that of shock; second phase sounded like diverting attention and being obstinate; in the third phase do we again see them coming around a little bit, particularly in the last few statements?

I would not like to make any comment on the gradation of their reactions. What Pakistan does ultimately is our sole concern.

- They are saying less detail to them, more detail to others.

They said, this is mere information and not evidence. But later they amended it. Earlier, we were hearing their reactions only through the media. Then I said that we have regular diplomatic contact, why is it not being used? It was then that they called our High Commission.

- Initially, they also said that we heard from the CIA and so we will tell the CIA and we have a relationship with them.

I am not aware of this.

- They made a public statement that the CIA has given them a dossier.

We gave them the dossier first. On January 5, we called the High Commissioner and handed over the dossier.

- Now, they are saying that we have authorised the Chinese Government to talk on our behalf. When the Chinese Vice-Minister came here, did he say that he was talking on Pakistan's behalf?

No. Their formulation is that both countries are friendly and we expect them to sort out issues on their own. I had a telephonic conversation with the Chinese Foreign Minister and when the Chinese Vice-Minister came here, I had just a few minutes courtesy call. Substantive talks took place between the Foreign Secretary and the Vice-Minister and it did not appear that they had taken up somebody's case.

- This was a period of great stress. The PM underwent a major surgery. It must have been very stressful for him over this month.

Some stress must have been there. I can say that the doctors have done a good job.

- To round off our discussions on Pakistan, the three points you raised are: They have to close all infrastructure of terrorism. Second, they have to punish the people involved in the Mumbai attacks. Third, they have to hand us over all those who have committed crimes in our country and are sitting there. And those include both Indian and Pakistani citizens — Indian citizens like Dawood Ibrahim and Pakistanis like Masood Azhar. Would you say that Pakistanis should not think that this is business as usual and that an incident happened, India is angry for some time, but with a few concessions we can carry on for the next four-five years until another big one happens.

The problem is different this time. We started 2008 with a series of attacks. It was not one. There were attacks on Delhi, Jaipur, Ahmedabad, Bangalore and the last one was on Mumbai.

- But many of those had Indian involvement.

I am not talking of Malegaon.

- But Indian Mujahideen are Indian Muslims. Do we have doubts that Indian Mujahideen is not fully Indian?

Yes, of course.

- Do we have evidence that Pakistanis could be involved?

In this case, we have found out that Pakistanis were involved.

- So Pranabda, Foreign Ministry, Finance Ministry, a lot of PM's responsibilities now, although he is getting better...

Yes, he is getting better. I think the doctors said that he can attend most of the work after four weeks, some work after two or three weeks and he can completely take over after six weeks.

- Right. Given the number of GoMs you head, what is the hierarchy of importance in your life? What takes most of your time and attention and thinking time? Is it the foreign policy, the economy, or West Bengal Congress?

Government business is my top priority. Whether I am in government or not, public issues dominate my life. I have no personal life, even though I am a family man. Days pass, though living under the same roof, I hardly see my wife — this despite the fact that she is sick. I normally leave my work table after 1 am. But before I go to sleep, I just touch her forehead to find her in deep sleep.

- In foreign policy, we have a situation where somebody is flying his planes low over the cities, or inventing calls from you. On the economy front, we have a global crisis. So what worries you more?

Issues cannot be compared, as every issue is important. As far as the global meltdown and its impact on India are concerned, the Prime Minister has already taken some measures.

- Do we expect some more measures?

No, the basic fundamental strength of the Indian economy is intact. It is not that we are coming down to 2 per cent growth or a negative growth. It may not be 9 per cent, but should be around 7 per cent.

- You also have to handle your party's politics and alliances.

One will have to do that always, as they are inter-linked. Whenever I have been in the government, some party responsibility has also been entrusted to me. For instance, I have been drafting the party manifesto since 1977.

- What is your view of the Left?

We cannot have an alliance with the Left, pre-election alliance is not possible.

- In West Bengal?

No. Out of the 60 Left members, 55 come from West Bengal, Kerala and Tripura. In all the three states, we are their rival — Kerala surely, Tripura yes, and in Bengal, Mamata is emerging as the bigger opposition party.

- Mamata Banerjee is also Congress by another name.

Yes.

- So do you see the likelihood of them again coming back with you in an alliance after the elections?

That depends on numbers. After all, democracy is nothing but numbers.

- You don't find it impossible given the ideological divide? Isn't the bitterness after the nuclear deal a deterrent?

The bitterness is there, so are the political differences, diversions of view, ideological differences.

- When you were negotiating till the last moment, it must have been frustrating that you were not able to close the deal with the Left.

But it did not leave any bitter taste in my mouth.

- Will you tell us something about the last meeting you had with veteran Left leader Jyoti Basu on this?

I tried my best, but failed. I tried to persuade Jyoti Basu that let the Left walk out. I did not say let them not oppose the government, because it was government policy that they were opposing. I requested them to walk out, but not vote with the BJP.

- What was his view?

I should not tell you that. It is already in the media. I would not like to comment on what he said.

- Have you found the Left more difficult to deal with since Prakash Karat took over?

No, Prakash is courteous, understanding, and decent. But ideological differences are there.

- It's not like the Congress and the BJP can never come together. It would be in the interest of India's politics if the two major political parties talk.

Of course, and it is not as if we have stopped talking. As the leader of the House, every session I talk to Mr Advani and Mr Jaswant Singh. Even after the Mumbai attack, I had an informal discussion with Mr Jaswant Singh.

- Thank you very much, we had a brilliant conversation. I know you have a million more important things to do, so I am so grateful you found the time.

Thank you.

008. Extracts from the Keynote Address by the Defence Minister A. K. Antony at the inauguration of the 11th Asian Security Conference on 'The Changing Face of Conflict and Evolving Strategies in Asia'.

New Delhi, February 3, 2009.

This year's conference is of great significance. It assumes particular salience in the context of the attacks on Mumbai and the systematic use of terrorism and irregular warfare as state policy aimed at India. It is becoming increasingly clear that the nature of war and conflict is changing. All-out wars are no longer the norm for settling political disputes among states. In fact, despite the military modernization underway in Asian countries, few wars have taken place. Afghanistan and Iraq are exceptions, since they are not typical inter-state wars. More Asian states today are not inclined to engage in large-scale conventional warfare, as they are no longer seen as the most effective way to securing political, economic and diplomatic gains.

The rapid globalization of recent years has led to profound changes by creating interdependence amongst states and people. In this backdrop, it does not seem likely that the states would move back to the classical inter-state wars of the bygone era. Liberal economic policies are increasingly connecting Asia to the world economy. Economic growth and prosperity today are dependent on stable ties and cooperation with other nations of the world. Free movement of goods, services and people, cross-border financial flows and Foreign Direct Investment are key drivers of economic growth today. These flourish only in a climate of peace and stability. Nation states, therefore, have high stakes in ensuring peace.

In such a situation, conflicts may occur, only if particular regimes facing internal economic and political problems unleash nationalism and war against an external 'enemy' to rally popular support. Asia, unfortunately, does have a number of unsettled territorial and sovereignty disputes. And these can be manipulated by irresponsible states to ensure regime stability. Both internal and external checks and balances, against such possible abuses of power are, therefore, necessary. Fortunately, many Asian states have wisely agreed to set aside disputes that cannot be resolved immediately and to maintain status quo. They have encouraged a system of dialogue and negotiations to peacefully resolve these disputes. And they are focused on enhancing cooperation. The India - China relationship is a good example of this approach.

Although external wars are no longer in vogue; civil wars, insurgencies, and militancy have become the principal modes of armed conflict today. Many flow from identity movements; others from extremist ideologies; and yet others from social, economic and political inequities that abound in our continent. These have made many Asian states extremely unstable and fragile. Dealing with these complex challenges through efficient and improved governance and effective development strategies must be of the highest importance for Asian nations. These will contribute to minimizing the scope and sources of violence between and within states. Steady democratization of states in Asia is needed for better protection of people's rights, and also for security.

India is committed to build strong, non-discriminatory international norms and institutions, so as to strengthen world peace and stability. We have resolved to work with the international community on global and universal nuclear disarmament and institutions that have legitimacy and enhance the security of all states. India hopes to gain its rightful place in the United Nations Security Council and make significant contribution to global security as a major stakeholder and responsible power.

We are engaged in a major diplomatic effort to construct a new Asian security order through bilateral and multilateral engagements. Our network of strategic defence and security ties with major powers such as the United States, Russia, China, Japan or with neighbouring countries of Southeast Asia, Africa, the Gulf and the Indian Ocean is aimed at creating confidence, enhancing state capacities to contribute to their security and stability and promoting transparency and understanding.

India's capacity building efforts in Afghanistan are particularly significant. The goal of our efforts is to contribute to Asian peace and stability and not undermine them.

India's role in the ASEAN Regional Forum and the East Asia Summit are similarly aimed at building a new architecture of stability and peace with states that are focused on development and regional institution building, that will create conditions for long-term economic growth, interdependence and prosperity in Asia.

The India-specific waiver by the Nuclear Supplier's Group in September 2008 has put aside a major roadblock to India's role and future development. For four decades, India had been subjected to an unfair and discriminatory international nuclear regime that has been brought to an end. The unique waiver for India - in recognition of its responsible role in non-proliferation - has opened the door for nuclear energy cooperation with the rest of the world. It enables us to play a more significant role in achieving the goals of non-proliferation and energy security. India would seek to ensure that the benefits of peaceful uses of nuclear energy will reach the states in keeping with their international obligations.

I have shared with you my thoughts on security in our times and the efforts we are making for safeguarding it. May I now revert to the important issue that I had raised in the beginning. While the prospects of inter-state armed conflicts are indeed declining, India and the Asian continent continue to face the challenge of terrorism. Pakistan has become the epicenter of international terrorism.

The assault on Mumbai and many previous attacks on Indian cities over the past few years have gravely undermined peace and security. Afghanistan has been a victim of similar acts, as indeed have been other countries.

That the major attacks of large magnitude can be planned and executed by elements in Pakistan totally undermines the solemn commitments to us made by its leadership that territory in its control would not be permitted to be used for terrorism. The positive gains of the past years have been destroyed by the dastardly attack on Mumbai. The onus now is on the Government of Pakistan to act with sincerity and decisiveness against the perpetrators and controllers of such attacks. It is in the interest of this region and the rest of the world that such perpetrators of wanton violence are brought to justice and the infrastructure of terror is eliminated.

There is equally an onus on the international community to act. This Frankenstein is now a threat to democracy, stability and peace in Afghanistan and to Pakistan itself. The international community needs to act decisively and in concert to get rid of this scourge. We sincerely hope that this approach would be the way ahead. As a victim of terrorism, we must remain committed to safeguarding the lives of our nationals and to taking all the necessary steps to enhance and safeguard our security.

The (Asian Security) Conference is being held at a critical juncture when the world is facing the prospects of an economic meltdown. This will have unforeseen implications for the global order and security. How will the Asian countries be affected by the economic crisis? What will be its impact on military modernization projects? Will non-state actors become more active? These are some of the issues which I hope the experts gathered here today will discuss in this conference. It is a matter of great satisfaction for us that so many leading experts and analysts from around the world have gathered here. Your participation raises the stature of the conference. At the end of your two-day deliberations, you will, I hope, come out with findings which will help policymakers deal with the grave threats presented by the changing nature of war

Distinguished participants of this High Level Conference Ladies and Gentlemen

I am pleased to be with you this morning to inaugurate this high level conference on 'Financial Crisis, Global Economic Performance and Development: Responses of Asia and the Global South' being organised by RIS in collaboration with a number of eminent think tanks and international organisations. It is entirely appropriate that India's premier policy think tank on international economic issues should mark its silver jubilee with an international conference bringing together leading officials and reputed experts from around the world to deliberate upon the current financial crisis affecting all countries of our planet.

2. On this occasion, I also pay tribute to the late Shri G. Parthasarathy, a distinguished son of India and the founder of RIS. Your organisation has, over these years, acquired a well-deserved reputation of an internationally acclaimed think tank, particularly in the South, which has made significant contribution to policy debates within India and abroad. In areas such as regional economic integration in Asia and multi-lateral negotiations, RIS has done pioneering work. You have, truly, given concrete shape to Shri Parthasarathy's vision. My congratulations to you, the staff and the faculty on your jubilee!

3. The current financial crisis, had its origins in the sub-prime lending sector in the United States and witnessed the collapse of the banking system in the West. It is, as former US Federal Reserve Chairman Greenspan has put it, "a once-in-a-half-century, probably once-in-a-century type of event". Before this crisis which erupted in full fury last year, the major global economic problems requiring urgent attention were rising food, commodity and fuel prices and the attendant complications arising from the growing threat of global warming.

4. The speed and ferocity of this crisis does not indicate any signs of abating. There are still no indications as to how it will progress and as to when it will bottom out. Last week's release of the 'World Economic Outlook' by the IMF predicts that 2009 would see the lowest world growth, since Second World War, of 0.5% which means that the global economy will practically stall; asserting that "uncertainty surrounding the outlook is unusually large", IMF had predicted 2.2% growth for 2009 just three months ago! The World Bank President has stated that the economic crisis has "already pushed an estimated 100 million people back into poverty."

5. As the debate rages about the ways to restore the health of the global economy, the basic tenets of economic theory, as formulated since the 1990s, are being set aside: as a Nobel Prize-winning economist put it, "there was a mystique to the idea that market participants knew the price to put on this or that risk". The conventional pre-suppositions have been undermined by the loss of faith in the banking institutions - particularly in the developed economies. The international community is acutely aware that, whilst maximizing individual national strengths, collective action needs to be taken at the earliest to avoid the horrors of the Great Depression of the late 1920s and the 1930s.

6. The course of the current crisis would, also, profoundly alter the structure of the global economy and have far-reaching implications for the future governance of the world: sovereign wealth funds have injected more capital into the emerging markets than the IMF and the World Bank combined. First, the structure of global economic governance would need to be changed profoundly with major developing economies having a say in it; failure to create a new architecture would lead countries towards competitive monetary policies and new investment barriers, increasing the potential for global market fragmentation. Second, as the G-20 Summit Declaration in Washington states, far greater economic coordination - at regional and global levels - would be needed to be achieved about the movement of capital. Last and not the least important, the aid and trade flows to the developing world must be maintained, as the Prime Minister said in his intervention at the Summit, to help stabilize the situation there where the vast majority of the world population lives.

Distinguished Participants, Ladies & Gentlemen

7. As this is a watershed moment in the history of the modern world, we need to think hard about the shape of its future. The global financial institutions need to put more resources for the developing countries in the rural economy, build social infrastructure and connectivities and to strengthen local communities. The resources must be put in institutional capacity-building and skills' development. It should be a veritable Marshal Plan for the economic uplift of the poorest sections of societies world-wide. To me, there is a necessity, once again, to revisit Gandhian economics with its emphasis on rural self-help and sustainable economic development. Anything contrary would be disastrous.

8. The current crisis may well accentuate the trends which are already evident. The growth rates, as stated in the recent IMF report, in the developing world remain positive even if lower than the earlier projections: the developed countries' economies would experience a contraction by 2% - the first annual contraction after 2nd World War. In a decade or so, the South may well account for more than 50% of the world income in purchasing power parity terms and more than 50% of the world trade, savings and investment as well as labour force and capital. According to the US National Intelligence Council (NIC), China and India are expected in 10 years to achieve near parity with the US in two different areas: scientific and human capital (India) and government receptivity to business innovation (China) and that the two countries will narrow significantly but not close the gap with US in all remaining factors.

9. India's per capita income, according to the recent survey, doubled in the last seven years, the sharpest rise being in the last five; inflation adjusted rise in per capita income would be 50%. After an average 9% growth in the last five years, we expect the economy to grow at 7% in the current fiscal despite the global economic downturn. As the next year's outlook is more downbeat, the Government has taken a number of measures to inject liquidity, bring down the cost of borrowing and stimulate demand through fiscal measures; when necessary, the Government will take further steps to ensure that labour intensive sectors are less adversely affected.

10. I find it most difficult to subscribe to the thesis that the current economic crisis is due in part or in its entirety to high savings rate in Asia. The savings rate in US fell from around 10% of the disposable income in the 1970s to 1% after 2005. The current circumstances make it imperative for the developing countries to enhance regional cooperation to mitigate the adverse impact of this crisis. We have the capability to do so and we need to be creative in our cooperation.

11. Asian regional cooperation structures have evolved significantly in recent years with important geo-political portents. India attaches great importance to deepening and diversifying South Asian Cooperation and with ASEAN. SAFTA symbolises the progress in regional free trade area. At the same time, ASEAN has made significant progress in regional economic integration. A regional financial architecture, drawing upon the high currency balances in Asia, would mitigate the severity of the economic crisis for us. The Chiang Mai Initiative is a major step which itself occurred in the wake of 1997-98 Southeast Asian Economic Crisis: several other variants can be thought of. A regional coordination mechanism can also help in better surveillance so as to prevent further crisis by taking timely action. We, in Asia, have the capacity to undertake significant contra-cyclical steps to drive the economy forward on the strength of the domestic demand by investing more on infra-structure, on labour intensive sectors and on the improvement of the social safety net.

12. Finally, I am confident that this Conference provides an excellent platform for exchange of views and will throw up ideas which would be valuable as inputs to policy makers. I wish your Conference every success.

Thank you!

011. Address by National Security Advisor M. K. Naraynan at the Munich Conference on Security Policy.

Munich, February 6, 2009.

Non-Proliferation, Arms control and future of nuclear weapons; is zero possible?

It gives me immense pleasure to present before such a distinguished audience India's views on the question - Non-proliferation, Arms control and the future of nuclear weapons; is zero possible?

To share a panel with distinguished personalities such as Dr. Henry Kissinger and Foreign Minister Steinmeier of Germany is indeed a privilege. Dr. Kissinger was the author of forward looking studies in the late 1980s wherein the doctrine of 'Discriminate Deterrence' was propounded. This doctrine in one way or the other has influenced during the decades of the 1980s & 1990s the development of military systems - both conventional and nuclear. It has thus had a significant impact on arms control, disarmament, and non-proliferation per se.

Foreign Minister Steinmeier was our honoured guest in India last year, as was Ambassador Ischinger, and is widely respected in our country. What Foreign Minister Steinmeier has said today was heard with great interest since Germany, though not a nuclear weapon State, had nuclear weapons stationed on its soil for decades. No issue relating to European or global security, or for that matter nuclear disarmament, can be meaningfully addressed without Germany's contribution.

It is, therefore, befitting that Munich, and the Munich Security Conference, should form the setting for a discussion on an issue of a seminal interest. In the past, the Munich Security Conference had played a key role in bringing together two antagonistic entities. If this Conference succeeds in not merely addressing the issue of nuclear reductions, but also devise pathways to their elimination, this might well be the transforming moment for the global community.

For many of us here questions relating to nuclear weapons viz. their control, reduction or elimination, is not a mere matter of academic debate. It involves serious, and vital, questions of national security.

At the outset, however, I would like to spell out how we define the three terms - arms control, disarmament and non-proliferation -which could be at some variance with the views of some other countries. We view disarmament as referring to concrete reductions in nuclear arsenals with the ultimate objective of achieving a nuclear-free world. We do not envisage it as replacing existing arsenals by new categories of nuclear weapon systems. Our perception of arms control is that by addressing the issue piecemeal it merely tends to perpetuate nuclear weapons in the hands of a few chosen nations. Non-proliferation is seen as essentially an extension of the arms control regime.

India's approach to nuclear disarmament, nuclear non-proliferation, and by extension to arms control, is essentially based on the belief that there exists close synergy between all three. Non-proliferation cannot be an end in itself, and has to be linked to effective nuclear disarmament. Nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation should be seen as mutually re-inforcing processes. Effective disarmament must enhance the security of all States and not merely that of a few.

India had set out goals regarding nuclear disarmament as far back as 1988. In June of that year, the then Prime Minister of India, Rajiv Gandhi, had presented to the United Nations an 'Action Plan for ushering in a nuclear weapons-free world and non-violent order', which outlined India's imperatives. It is significant that the Action Plan began with the following words which appear even more relevant to-day:

"Humanity stands at a cross-roads of history. Nuclear weapons threaten to annihilate human civilization and all that mankind has built through millennia of labour and toil. Nuclear weapon states and non-nuclear weapon states alike are threatened by such a holocaust. It is imperative that nuclear weapons be eliminated".

The Action Plan was by far the most comprehensive initiative at the time, on nuclear disarmament, covering issues ranging from nuclear testing and cessation of production of fissile material for nuclear weapons to a time-bound elimination of stockpiles. At the heart of the Action Plan was a commitment to eliminate all nuclear weapons in stages by 2010.

India has been, and still remains, a strong and unwavering advocate of global nuclear disarmament, reflecting the passionate advocacy of nuclear disarmament of its first Prime Minister, Pt. Jawaharlal Nehru. Even to-day, India is perhaps the only nuclear weapons State to express its readiness to negotiate a Nuclear Weapons Convention leading to global, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons.

In October 2006, India put forward a set of proposals at the United Nations General Assembly in a Working Paper which outlined certain steps that could lead to the elimination of nuclear weapons. I might here mention a few of these suggestions here:

- Reaffirm the unequivocal commitment by all nuclear weapon States to the complete elimination of nuclear weapons;
- reduce the salience of nuclear weapons in security doctrines;
- reduce nuclear danger, including the risk of accidental nuclear war, by de-alerting nuclear-weapons to prevent unintentional or accidental use of nuclear weapons;
- negotiate a global agreement among nuclear weapons States on 'no-first-use' of nuclear weapons;
- negotiate a universal and legally-binding agreement on non-use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States;
- negotiate a Convention on the complete prohibition of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons; and
- negotiate a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and on their time-bound destruction, leading to the global, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons.

While awaiting concrete and practical measures for the elimination of nuclear weapons and the means of delivery, and the creation of a legal regime or universal applicability, India welcomes the renewed interest in and support that nuclear disarmament has received from statesmen as well as experts in the field. India is prepared to engage with the various proponents of nuclear disarmament and to meaningfully contribute to these initiatives. India has taken note of the initiatives in this regard launched by four eminent statesmen - Dr. Kissinger, George Shultz, William Perry and Sam Nunn, whose ideas are now included in the 'Hoover Plan'. India's position was very recently enumerated by India's Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. First, on June 9, 2008, to mark the 20th anniversary of the presentation of the Action Plan by Shri Rajiv Gandhi at the United Nations, and next, when the Prime Minister addressed the UN General Assembly in September 2008. The running theme of both the speeches was a reiteration of India's support for a Nuclear Weapons Convention and endorsement of a nuclear weapons-free world as enshrined in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988.

The debate on disarmament, specially nuclear disarmament, gives rise to the hope of greater understanding that could lend itself to a firm commitment for action on nuclear disarmament. As concrete steps towards this end, I shall mention the following:

1. Reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment by all States possessing nuclear weapons to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons. Commitments must be clear and unambiguous and convey some urgency for achieving this goal. This would apply to NPT States as well as non-NPT States.
2. Reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in security doctrines. It is unfortunate that despite the end of Cold War, there has not been any appreciable change in the centrality of nuclear weapons in the security doctrines of the major nuclear weapon powers.
3. Adoption of measures by States to reduce nuclear dangers, including preventing the unintentional or accidental use of nuclear weapons. Since 1998, India has been sponsoring in the General Assembly a Resolution entitled "Reducing Nuclear Danger". We welcome the fact that more countries are now paying attention to global de-alerting of nuclear weapons.
4. Negotiations on global agreement among the nuclear powers of a 'no first use' of nuclear weapons.

5. Negotiations towards a universal and legally binding agreement on non-use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States.
6. Negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention on the prohibition of the use, and threat of use, of nuclear weapons. Since 1982, India has proposed that such a Convention be negotiated in the Conference on Disarmament.
7. Negotiations on a Nuclear Weapons Convention that would prohibit the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and on their destruction leading to a global non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons within a specified time-frame.

I would like to conclude by once again recalling Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's stark warning when he presented his Action Plan to the UN General Assembly in 1988. He said that the 'alternative to co-existence is co-destruction'. We hope that the message of this Conference will be firmly in favour of humanity's co-existence in a nuclear weapon free world.

012. Valedictory Address by Secretary (Economic Relations) in the Ministry of External Affairs H.S. Puri at Research and Information System (RIS), Silver Jubilee Conference on the theme: "Financial Crisis, Global Economic Governance & Development: Responses of Asia and the Global South".

New Delhi, February 7, 2009.

Ambassador Leela Ponnappa, Deputy National Security Adviser & Vice-Chairperson RIS

Dr. Nagesh Kumar, Director General of RIS

Distinguished Guests, Ladies & Gentlemen

Thank you for inviting me to address this Conference. Over the past two days some very distinguished and eminent experts from all over the world have made presentations at the Conference on a theme of considerable topical relevance. I believe that this Conference has succeeded in bringing together leading development institutions and thinkers from different countries on one platform to facilitate a policy dialogue on the responses of the South to the international crisis. I must congratulate RIS for conceiving this Conference, as a part of its Silver Jubilee celebrations, by providing a forum for dialogue to assist in evolving a developing country response of the Global South to what is clearly the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression of the 1930s. I hope that this dialogue sustained by RIS and its partners to provide ideas and inputs for policy formulation at different levels.

2. The international financial crisis had its origins in the developed Western world. Starting from the US domestic sub-prime mortgage sector meltdown, it has developed into a crisis of historically unprecedented magnitude and scope. The crisis was a result of "a flaw in the model" comprising of [i] A regulatory and supervisory failure in major developed countries; [ii] A failure in risk management in the private financial institutions; and [iii] A failure in market discipline mechanism. The crisis bearing a 'Made in the US' label had its toxic assets exported to Europe and the rest of the world.

3. In a globalised world with inter-related economies, no continent or country is totally isolated or insulated from the impact of this crisis.

Therefore, it is clear that real economies have been badly affected by the demand compression in the Western world and outflow of resources from all across the developing world. Economies that were highly dependent on exports or foreign investments have been more severely hit than others.

4. At the same time, it is true that Asia has been somewhat immune to the impact of the crisis. The impact on Asia has clearly been limited in comparison with that on USA and Europe. This was due to many factors; I would like to underline a couple of them: Asia did not receive or hold the toxic assets of the West to the extent these were found in the developed world. Secondly, Asia's experience of the financial crisis in the late 1990s helped to cushion the adverse impact to some extent.

5. Despite this, Asian economies facing the ripple effect have taken numerous steps to counter the impact of the global financial crisis. Liquidity packages to shore-up credit availability have been announced. Numerous monetary and fiscal measures are being implemented. Though important, these may not be sufficient. A major constraint remains the lack of demand including for credit and investment. One policy lesson highlighted in the Conference is that generation of domestic demand in developing countries by making the underprivileged sections a part of the mainstream will not only make the growth process more inclusive but also more sustainable. This constitutes an important input for policy formulation in developing countries. The fiscal stimulus packages being evolved by different Governments should be directed at these segments of society where the propensity for consumption is the highest, that is to say, the underprivileged segments of society.

6. The present crisis has demonstrated, apart from other things, that developing countries have a critical stake in the international financial system. Even though India had its prudential norms for the financial sector and our banking system was well regulated, Indian economic growth process has been adversely affected due to the crisis. The failure to implement the long pending proposals for reform of international financial architecture has clearly cost the world dearly. It is now time to urgently take up a comprehensive reform and build a new financial architecture that will be more development friendly and more in tune with the present economic realities, rather than what existed in the 1940s when the Bretton Woods Institutions were crafted. Developing countries need to have their say and weight in the Bretton Woods Institutions. Further, developing countries have to coordinate their positions in these discussions. As highlighted in the Conference, there is scope to explore ways to evolve regional and broader Southern architectures for monetary and financial cooperation. With such initiatives, developing countries will be able to play their due role in the process of reform.

7. Having learnt the right lessons, the Asian economies are in a better position to take measures to protect themselves from this, still, gathering storm. Asian economies, due to their high savings rate, have better currency reserves and can, therefore, provide structural solutions to the crisis which has left every citizen of the world affected in some measure. Prime Minister, during his intervention at the G20 Summit in Washington, emphasised the critical imperative of ensuring aid and trade flows to the developing countries. The Asian leaderships would need to look within the region and within their own respective countries, without raising protectionist barriers, to generate demand for their goods and services which are, presently, largely driven by demand in the European and US markets. This would entail important alterations in their economic structures. Within the countries, the vulnerable sections of the society, rural populations, agrarian sector, self-help groups etc. would need to be especially catered for to make economic growth inclusive and caring for the members of the local community.

8. This crisis has also altered the dynamics of economic growth in the world dramatically. Presently, growth is taking place primarily in the South. Emergence of the South as a new growth pole is a remarkable phenomenon with considerable potential. It also puts in focus the critical need for South-South cooperation at various levels such as bilateral, sub-regional, regional or inter-regional levels. Given the complexity of the crisis, the Asian response is still evolving. I understand there was a discussion on regional cooperation within the SAARC and BIMSTEC frameworks. In the light of the new trends, it is imperative that we deepen our mutual cooperation and share our dynamism for mutual benefit. The Government attaches very high importance to deepening South Asian economic integration. SAFTA is being implemented in a phased manner. Simultaneously, steps are on to extend the scope of trade liberalization in South Asia to trade in services in the form of a SAARC Agreement on Trade in Services (SATIS), on the basis of an initial draft proposed by RIS. It has been agreed that SATIS will be GATS plus, have a positive list approach and is expected to be finalized by end-2009.

9. As the global economy goes through a churn, it is time to look beyond as to what kind of institutional architecture we would need to create to avoid such cataclysmic events like the current one. G20 leaders are looking at the global architecture but I would like to recall what EAM stated in his inaugural address at this Conference. We should develop a regional financial architecture which is both flexible as well as inclusive and not so doctrinaire as has been the experience with the global financial institutions. Prime Minister, in his intervention at G20 Summit, talked of swap arrangements. The Chiang Mai Initiative and the Latin American Reserve Fund are examples of such regional arrangements which have the potential to develop further. There is even talk, in some academic circles, to have an Asian currency unit or an Asian basket of currencies. One needs to look at these issues more closely as they have the potential to become the building blocks for global structure.

10. India has been an active and productive partner in developing regional cooperation, certainly as far as South Asia and South East Asia are concerned. Whether it is the East Asia Summit, the India-ASEAN Summit mechanism or SAARC, India has made considerable contribution to these regional organisations. In these activities, RIS has played a significant role for policy inputs. It is now engaged in an exercise with its counterpart think tanks in East Asia to develop a blue print for Comprehensive Economic Partnership for East Asia.

11. Thus, South-South Cooperation remains a viable and an increasingly relevant development strategy, pursuant to continued growth in emerging markets and accumulation of valuable development experiences including more appropriate technology and expertise for other developing countries. India attaches importance to South-South Cooperation. The Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) programme has evolved over the past four decades into a sizeable magnitude. A considerable proportion of India's development cooperation effort is devoted to sharing expertise and capacity building. Over 5000 participants from 158 developing partner countries are accepted for ITEC training at 43 institutions offering around 200 vocational courses per annum. India is also assisting other developing countries in development of infrastructure and educational and medical facilities through projects and experts. India is building a pan-African e-network linking 55 educational and medical institutions in African countries with their counterparts in India. Last April, India announced duty free market access for products of least developed countries (LDCs) except for a small negative list.

12. Finally, the financial crisis has also highlighted the importance of Government intervention and regulations. India has always believed in a middle path and followed a mixed economy with co-existence of private and public sectors and development friendly public intervention. In the light of the recent developments, there is need to carefully calibrate the role and importance of Governments and public sector to provide adequate regulation without stymieing private initiative. The Bretton Woods Institutions need to be overhauled in the short-term and comprehensively reformed thereafter. The development experiences of the past fifty years suggest that there is no-one-size-fits-all policy that would be relevant for all the countries at all levels of development. Countries need to constantly fine tune the nature and extent of their public intervention and need the 'policy space' to enable them to do that.

13. I thank RIS for giving me this opportunity and congratulate its members on RIS' Silver Jubilee!

Thank you

013. Interview of UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon with the Chief Editor of The Hindu, N. Ram.

New Delhi, February 7, 2009.

[Ban Ki-moon responds to questions on the Mumbai terror attacks, India-Pakistan relations, Afghanistan, Gaza, Iran, and climate change. The United Nations Secretary-General, who was in New Delhi for a day on Thursday following his visit to Afghanistan and Pakistan, gave this half-an-hour interview to The Hindu in his suite at the Ashok Hotel.]

Pakistan

You have just had discussions with the President and Prime Minister of Pakistan. You have called on Pakistan to have a "full investigation" into the Mumbai terror attacks and to "fully cooperate" with the Indian government in this matter. "Fully cooperate," I take it, means two things: bringing those responsible [for the Mumbai attacks] to justice; and eliminating the terror infrastructure in Pakistan so that future attacks can be ruled out. Are you confident that both will happen given what has happened?

I would not pre-judge at this time what the Pakistani government will say. But I am convinced that the Pakistani government is also committed to addressing terrorism. Prime Minister [Yousuf Raza] Gilani told me that his government was going to enact the legislation to allow them to punish those Pakistani people who engage in terrorist acts outside Pakistan. It seems that there is no such law by which they can punish those people, as we have seen in the Mumbai terrorist attack.

The United Nations Security Council has adopted a battery of resolutions against terrorism, requiring a number of actions by state parties. Are you satisfied with the response of the concerned state parties to the terror attacks in Mumbai? And have you had a chance to look at the evidence provided by the Indian and other governments [that the Mumbai terror attacks originated in Pakistan]?

First of all, it was just totally unacceptable - the terrorist attack [in Mumbai] on the citizens of India and foreigners. Terrorism under whatever reasons and grievances cannot be justified. That should be addressed in the name of humanity and eradicated in the name of humanity. The United Nations has been leading this effort to address and eradicate and fight against international terrorism. Since the early 1960s, member states have had 13 international conventions on different aspects of terrorism. Now they have been discussing the way to adopt a comprehensive convention against international terrorism. Unfortunately, we have not been able to reach there because of some technical - but it seems to be a very sensitive - issue on the definition of terrorism and the scope of terrorism. But I think at this time the political will among the international community is important. When I was working in the office of the President of the [UN] General Assembly eight years ago, 2001-2002 - that was the year 9/11 happened - that was the most appropriate time for the international community to reach a deal on this issue. But we missed the opportunity. Now, as we have seen in Mumbai, this really gives us some resolve, strengthens our resolve to work on this comprehensive international convention against terrorism. I would once again urge this and I will work towards that end.

The question is being asked here - and let me mention that our newspaper has taken a sober stand in this crisis and said, 'don't be hawkish, this issue has to be resolved through dialogue' and so on - but there are many voices in India which raise the following question. Why should an aggrieved India, not just the government but also the people of India, have faith in Pakistan's investigative and judicial systems when Pakistan itself is expressing its lack of confidence in these systems by asking the UN to inquire into the assassination of Benazir Bhutto? You made an announcement in Islamabad that there would be a three-member inquiry commission and Dawn newspaper has speculated that it will be headed by the Chilean Ambassador to the UN, Heraldo Munoz. But the point is their systems are very fragile.

We've been discussing the terms of reference and the scope and nature of this Bhutto assassination inquiry commission. This is not going to be the same commission as was established by the mandate [Resolution 1595] of the Security Council on the assassination of the former Lebanese Prime Minister [Rafik] Hariri. This is a fact-finding commission, it's not a criminal investigation. That was the understanding between the United Nations and the Pakistani government after extensive consultation on this matter. I have written to the President of the Security Council who has taken note of my intention to establish this one. I will not at this time say anything about the exact composition but it will be made known very shortly. He [Ambassador Munoz] is one of the candidates.

The Indian government has made it clear that it relies a good deal on what the Indian press calls "international pressure" to ensure that Pakistan does the right thing to get to the bottom of the Mumbai terror. What are the instruments available in this regard? Diplomats will talk about "persuasion" but whatever it is, there is an international factor here, including the United Nations. Do you think something more could be done? Some people even talked about smart sanctions like a travel ban, freezing of assets and so on. What's your thinking on this?

In investigating and addressing terrorism, that should be done voluntarily by any member state [of the UN] even before any pressure, so-called pressure, comes. This is, after all, a crime against humanity. It is not some small crime, which may happen anywhere around the world. Terrorism, terrorist activities should be addressed in the name of humanity and there should be active efforts by the whole international community regardless of where it happened. The whole international community should fully cooperate.

During your visit to Pakistan, you called on Pakistan and India to address and resolve longstanding issues, including Kashmir, peacefully through dialogue. You expressed hope that the composite dialogue will be resumed.

Yes.

There is some disquiet in India - I'm not referring to your statement in Pakistan - about this tendency on the part of some western leaders to bring in Kashmir in the context of resolving the issue of cross-border terrorism between Pakistan and India. There is sensitivity here about speaking about cross-border terrorism and Kashmir as proximate issues.

I'm aware of all the historical and political background of the Kashmir issue. That's one of the longstanding issues in the world. Therefore what I can tell you at this time is that this issue should also be resolved harmoniously through dialogue. Now it was very encouraging that India and Pakistan have initiated a composite dialogue. There were many high-profile exchanges between the two countries. That I hope will continue and proceed. When you are having such serious problems in addressing the terrorist attack in Mumbai, that is a particular case, though it is a very serious crime which must be punished. But that should not be an obstacle in strengthening your [relationship] in a comprehensive dimension between the two countries. India, Pakistan - they are the largest countries, democratic countries, and countries of great potentialities. If the two countries have full cooperation, there can be much greater synergy.

Afghanistan

You have just made what the press calls a "surprise visit" to Afghanistan where you declared that Afghanistan would be a priority area for the UN in 2009 and pledged strong UN support to help deliver peace and stabilise democracy, especially in the context of the elections due in August 2009. But everyone knows the security situation in Afghanistan is deteriorating in the face of a resurgent Taliban. So how do you propose to go about helping deliver peace, democracy, and development in what looks like a very grim situation?

That is exactly the source of deep concern for me as a Secretary-General and for the international community. That with such massive support - political, economic, and military support - the security situation has been deteriorating. Now there should be a political consensus, a political process. This is exactly what I urged President [Hamid] Karzai, to further engage in inclusive political dialogue. The military option can be a very effective tool. But that cannot be the sole option. A military option should always be complemented by a political solution. Afghanistan is going through a very crucial period this year. Now depending upon how they, and how the international community, do, it may be very crucial. They may be standing at a crossroads. They are going to have a presidential election this year, on August 20. That can be a very important occasion to bring Afghanistan into a fuller democracy and a participatory democracy. The United Nations stands ready to provide technical assistance to make this election a fair and democratic and objective one.

UN reports have noted the high number of civilian casualties caused by the U.S. and allied international forces in Afghanistan. But now President [Barack] Obama is promising a surge of new troops. The military component seems to be getting greater weightage in Afghanistan. Doesn't that concern you?

Civilian casualties have been a concern for me for long, particularly since 2007 when I became the Secretary-General. I have raised this issue with the ISAF [International Security Assistance Forces] commander and also the Secretary-General of NATO and I have of course discussed it with senior American authorities - not to have any civilian casualties. In the course of military operations, it may be the case that civilians become victimised. But what we have seen has been very tragic and therefore it is absolutely necessary that the military commanders, when engaging in military operations, must ensure that they avoid civilian casualties. For that I have urged the strengthening of these civil-military coordination systems. My Special Representative [for Afghanistan], Mr. Kai Eide, is now coordinating with all international actors, including ISAF.

Sri Lanka

Closer home (to where our newspaper is based), in Sri Lanka, you have one combatant, which is banned or designated as terrorist in 31 countries, boxed in a very narrow territory with about 120,000 civilians. What is your reading of this? You must have got many reports.

Again, the situation in Sri Lanka has been a source of concern and I discussed this recently with Sri Lankan leaders. Even today I am going to speak with President [Mahinda] Rajapaksa [They spoke over the telephone and the Sri Lankan President assured Mr. Ban that "military operations to defeat terrorism in Sri Lanka would be carried out without harassment to the civilian population" in the north]. First of all, evaluating this situation and expressing my concern about the humanitarian situation, the civilian casualties. About ten days ago, before my departure, I received the Special Envoy of President Rajapaksa in New York and we discussed this issue. I have asked, through our Special Envoy to President Rajapaksa and his government to ensure that there should be no civilian casualties. There should be full guarantee of the security and safety of United Nations staff and humanitarian workers. And I was assured by President Rajapaksa that he would ensure this. There are very serious humanitarian concerns. I am considering dispatching a humanitarian assessment team.

Gaza

What do you say to a young Palestinian in Gaza who feels the failure of the United Nations to get the Israelis to stop their aggression proves the ineffectiveness of the world body? Or is it expecting too much of the U.N.?

I won't agree to the so-called failure of the United Nations. This Middle East situation has been there for six decades. It is the United Nations that has been leading this Middle East peace process during the last six decades. Largely because of the lack of political will on the part of the parties concerned, peace has not been established. Genuine peace. During the last six decades, we have seen many wars. It is almost unprecedented in history. So that's very tragic and unfortunate.

Now, if we talk about this Gazan situation, it was the United Nations together with major leaders, powers, in the region and elsewhere that has brought this ceasefire. And I travelled to many countries, I met so many leaders in the region and outside the region to bring about this ceasefire. I think the United Nations played a pivotal role this time, a key role. Now Egypt has also been playing a key role and there are many other leaders (I don't mention their names because there are so many). It is not one country or individual leaders. It has been a joint diplomatic effort.

This ceasefire is very fragile, as we have already seen through several cases of exchanging rockets and bombings. This ceasefire must be turned into a durable and sustainable one. That's what I am doing. The United Nations is now mobilising humanitarian assistance, immediate and only recovery assistance. I have appealed Monday last week for urgent humanitarian assistance, made an urgent appeal for $ 613 million [to help people affected by Israel's three-week military offensive in the Gaza Strip], and there is going to be an international donors conference in the first week of March in Cairo. I am going to be the co-sponsor of this international conference. Now I know the frustrations and challenges to the pride of Palestinian people in Gaza, particularly young people who have been victimised, women and children. I'd like to give them some hope, a sense of hope. They have the full support of the international community, the United Nations. We are working very hard to help them overcome this humanitarian suffering and also meet their long-term socio-economic rehabilitation.

Iran

President Obama has promised a new approach to Iran but the clock of UNSC sanctions continues to tick. Do you think suspending or holding sanctions in abeyance till Washington and Tehran get a chance to have a better relationship and resume a bilateral dialogue could be one way to proceed?

With a new administration in the United States, there is hope that the dynamics of negotiation may change. That is what I would also hope and expect. Before everything, it is important for Iran to fully comply with the relevant Security Council resolutions. That is, first and foremost, important. [As for] the rest of the issues, I hope with the change of administration and change in the political dynamics, there will be very in-depth negotiations so that we can be free from those nuclear concerns.

Climate Change

On climate change. First, congratulations on your award [the Sustainable Development Leadership Award 2009, presented at the Delhi Sustainable Summit on February 5]. You've said climate change was a priority for the United Nations. There are many priorities. How high, how important a priority is this?

My top priority and target is to have an international agreement by the end of December this year in Copenhagen. An international agreement that is comprehensive and balanced and effective. A ratifiable one that will be a successor regime of the Kyoto Protocol. India can play a very important, crucially important role. That's why I am here. I am going to meet with senior Indian government officials. Everybody is looking at India, what India will do. Now President Obama and his administration are very positively engaged, unlike the previous, Bush administration. This is a very good sign. While I fully understand the challenges of India, when it comes to greenhouse emissions in per capita terms the level of these greenhouse gas emissions by India, Indian industry is far less than those [the levels] of industrialised countries. But at this time, when this is by far the most urgent and serious existential threat for all humanity and planet Earth, the whole international community must act together. Now is the time to act. Therefore I would sincerely urge and appeal to the Indian government to really engage in in-depth negotiations. This year we have only ten months left.

014. Extracts from the Address by the President Smt. Prtibha Devisingh Patil to the joint session of the Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha

New Delhi, February 12, 2009.

Honourable Members,

1. I convey my good wishes to you and to all our people. On behalf of all of us, let me greet Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. We are happy that he is recuperating fast. We wish him a speedy recovery for continuing with his onerous responsibilities. I also convey my special greetings to members of our security forces keeping vigil to protect us. We have been through an eventful year--a year that challenged our open society and our open economy. A year that tested by fire the principles that our country has always lived by- communal amity, tolerance, compassion, justice and peaceful coexistence.

57. The nation faced multiple internal security challenges. The country witnessed terrorist attacks in several cities with growing levels of sophistication and assistance from outside the country. Several innocent lives have been lost. The terrorist attack in Mumbai as well as the terrorist incidents in Delhi, Ahmedabad, Hyderabad, Jaipur, Bengaluru and Assam and before that on our Embassy in Kabul, were an assault on all the values that our country stands for. The attack in Mumbai was deliberately planned to retard our economic progress. My government is heartened by the international support it has received after these attacks. There is greater appreciation in the international community of the threat that exists to the region and the world from the terrorism emanating from Pakistan.

58. I salute the members of our security forces, including members of State police forces, who face grave challenges from terrorists, left wing extremist and insurgent groups and resolutely defend the integrity and sovereignty of our country. Many of them have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives, most recently in the attacks in Mumbai. We share the grief of their families, and my Government will ensure that they are adequately compensated so that they can lead normal lives.

59. My government has strengthened the country's internal security to protect people from such mindless acts of violence. A National Investigation Agency has been established to deal with terrorism. The Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act has been amended to deal with terrorist offences and terrorist organizations. These measures have strengthened the legal and investigative framework to tackle terrorist forces. While arming the internal security apparatus with these powers, all care would be taken to uphold legal procedures and prevent any misuse of such powers. A comprehensive plan has been drawn up to strengthen maritime and coastal security against threats from the sea.

63. The protection of India's security and territorial integrity has received the highest attention of my Government. Our Armed Forces have made the country proud with their sense of commitment, sacrifice and professionalism. They have time and again come to the aid of civil authority in natural disasters, as well as to combat insurgency in affected areas.

64. Our long borders encompassing different geographical and climate conditions and terrains make it imperative to keep the Armed Forces in a state of full preparedness to face diverse challenges at all times. The modernization programme of the Armed Forces is focused on state-of-the-art technology, network centric warfare, and includes an Integrated Space Cell to deal with the challenges posed by the militarization of space. Government stands committed to give financial support for modernization to the required extent. The actions taken by the Indian Navy to deal with threats of piracy in the Gulf of Aden and to secure our sea-lanes of communication have demonstrated our capacity and willingness to protect our interests.

65. Our research and development efforts in the area of defence technology showed concrete results through launches of the Agni-I and Agni-III and other missiles. The main battle tank Arjun was productionised. Defence procurement procedures were continually reviewed and updated to ensure maximum transparency, economy of resources and support for our indigenization efforts.

66. India has the second largest diaspora in the world. The overseas Indian community estimated at over 25 million is spread across every major region in the globe. My government has taken a series of measures to improve the welfare of overseas Indians, particularly in West Asia and the Gulf, and to create mechanisms to facilitate their participation in nation building activities. These have included scholarship programmes, the creation of the India Development Foundation, the establishment of a

Council for Promotion of Overseas Employment and an Overseas Workers Resource Centre and a People of Indian Origin/Non Resident Indian University. In recognition of the importance attached to the role of overseas Indians, a Prime Minister's Global Advisory Council of Persons of Indian Origin has been set up to catalyse ideas for national development.

67. My government has accorded highest priority to fostering close political, economic, social and cultural relations with all countries, on the basis of sovereign equality and mutual respect, to help promote a friendly and peaceful external environment, to safeguard our national security and ensure rapid socio-economic development for our people. We have also consistently endeavoured to promote a stable and prosperous South Asia in the recognition of the fact that we are bound by strong ties of history, culture and ethnicity.

68. The conduct of our foreign policy has enhanced India's stature in the world. My government's foreign policy has been imbued with the values that our nation rests upon - of independence of thought and action, ensuring a democratic, just and equitable world order and the rule of law. India's views on the major international issues of our times are not just heard, but are now being actively sought.

69. My Government worked actively with the international community to address key global challenges of terrorism, energy and food security, climate change and sustainable development, the global economic and financial crisis, and the reform of international institutions, including of the United Nations, to reflect contemporary realities.

70. The conclusion of an India Specific Safeguards Agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency and the decision of the Nuclear Suppliers' Group in 2008 to allow its members to enter into full civil nuclear cooperation and trade with India in nuclear material and technology marks the beginning of the end of thirty four years of nuclear isolation and the technology denial regime that India was being subjected to. This has opened the way for our indigenous nuclear power generation programme to be reinforced by additionalities through international civil nuclear energy cooperation, thereby also contributing to the global fight against climate change. The opening of such cooperation with India is a vindication of India's impeccable record on non-proliferation and our long-standing commitment to universal, non-discriminatory and comprehensive nuclear disarmament.

71. India discharged her responsibilities in South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation to promote economic re-integration in our neighbourhood. During India's Chairmanship of the SAARC and thereafter, several regional initiatives, including the decision to establish the South Asian University in India, were launched which transformed SAARC from a declaratory to an implementation phase.

72. We consolidated our relations with Afghanistan, and remained closely involved with its economic reconstruction and development efforts. We wish to see a stable, pluralistic and democratic Afghanistan. The terrorist attack on our Embassy in Kabul in 2008 was a matter of deep concern and reinforced our determination to fulfill our commitments to the people of Afghanistan. We welcome the return of multi-party democratic politics in Bangladesh and remain committed to working closely with the newly elected Government. The visit of the Prime Minister to Bhutan and my own visit to represent India at the Coronation of His Majesty Jigme Khesar Wangchuck further consolidated our multi-faceted relations with our closest neighbour. India and the Maldives continue to enjoy traditional bonds of friendship and close cooperation. With Myanmar we have conducted our relations in a manner that reflects our shared history and mutual desire to promote peace and tranquility along the border. Government extended its full support to the people of Nepal in their historic transition to a multi-party democracy, and we wish them well.

73. We are concerned at the plight of civilians internally displaced in Sri Lanka on account of escalation of the military conflict. We continue to support a negotiated political settlement in Sri Lanka within the framework of an undivided Sri Lanka acceptable to all the communities, including the Tamil community. I would appeal to the Government of Sri Lanka and to the LTTE to return to the negotiating table. This can be achieved if, simultaneously, the Government of Sri Lanka suspends its military operations and the LTTE declares its willingness to lay down arms and to begin talks with the government.

74. Our relations with Pakistan have made considerable progress since 2004, but, regrettably, terrorism from Pakistan has eroded the achievements of the bilateral dialogue process and has caused a grave setback to our relations. Despite solemn commitments given by Pakistan at the highest level that it would not allow territory under its control to be used for terrorism in any manner against India, terrorists from Pakistan have continued to attack India. We expect Pakistan to honour the commitments made to us, and to take decisive and credible action against all terrorist groups that are based in, and operate from, its territory.

75. Our relations with the People's Republic of China have witnessed regular high-level exchanges, growing economic and trade ties, increased defence contacts and enhanced people-to-people exchanges. Our Strategic and Cooperative Partnership with China is progressively acquiring a more regional and international perspective. Both sides are also engaged in efforts at resolving outstanding issues including the boundary question through dialogue, while maintaining peace and tranquility in the border areas.

76. The signing of the Agreement on Cooperation on Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy with USA was one of the manifestations of the transformation in our relationship with the United States of America. Our relations with the USA cover a broad canvas of sectors ranging from science and technology, agriculture, education, health to trade and investment. We look forward to working with the new Administration to mutual benefit in the bilateral field as well as on the major challenges of our time. India's strategic partnership and long standing relations with Russia have been strengthened and diversified. Russia remains our valued partner in meeting our defence and nuclear energy needs, and in the area of science and technology, including cooperation in the field of space. Our interaction with the European Union and other countries in Europe in the fields of defence and security, science and technology, trade and investment, agriculture, culture and education has significantly deepened. Agreements on civil nuclear cooperation were signed with Russia and France, and negotiations to conclude similar agreements with other friendly countries were initiated.

77. Our Strategic and Global Partnership with Japan was consolidated and our relations are marked by a strong mutual desire to harness our complementarities. Our engagement with East Asia was a manifestation of our belief that the twenty-first century belongs to Asia, and that India has a role to play in the Asian resurgence. My visits to Vietnam and Indonesia, and India's participation for the first time in the Summit meeting of the ASEM countries provided a major impetus to our "Look East Policy".

78. We paid special attention to the intensification of our traditional and historic relations with the Gulf. The visit of the Prime Minister to Oman and Qatar opened new avenues of cooperation in the areas of energy security, investment and welfare of Indians working in the Gulf. Our ties with West Asia were reinforced through the visits of the Presidents of Egypt, Syria and the Palestinian Authority. The most tragic loss of lives and acute suffering surrounding the recent incursions into Gaza highlight the urgent need for a comprehensive resolution of the Palestinian issue. We remain steadfast in our support to the Palestinian cause, and in our desire to see peace and stability in West Asia. The government worked towards building a contemporary relationship with Iran. The visit by the President of Kazakhstan as the Chief Guest for our Republic Day symbolized the importance attached by Government to our extended neighbourhood in Central Asia.

79. My Government opened a new chapter in our relations with the great continent of Africa. The first ever India-Africa Forum Summit held in India established a blueprint for our relations with Africa for the future. We will share our resources and technical know-how to assist Africa in its development efforts. My first overseas visit as President was to Brazil, Mexico and Chile. Several steps have been taken to tap the vast potential that exists in our relations with Latin America and the Caribbean countries.

80. India's participation in the Summit meeting of the G-20 countries, and the hosting of the third IBSA Summit and second BIMSTEC Summit in India were utilized to forge new, and strengthen existing, economic linkages at a time of turmoil in the international economic and financial system.

81. Honourable Members, the efforts of my government were singularly focused on enhancing the prosperity of our people through the sharing of opportunity. My government believes that its programmes for inclusive development have created those opportunities that help share the benefits of progress more equitably. When a child in a remote tribal village has access to a local school that has come up in her habitation, when her health care needs are attended to, when her parents do not have to migrate for work but find employment locally through the National Rural Employment Guarantee Act, when they have rights on their land, and when they are empowered to make the government accountable to them for these actions through the Right to Information we have moved closer to meeting the goals that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru flagged for the nation. At the turn of our independence his clarion call in these very hallowed precincts was that collectively we must act to "remove poverty, ignorance, disease and the inequality of opportunity". Even while acknowledging that the move towards an inclusive society with equal opportunities for all our citizens is still work in progress, on the basis of the record of its performance, it is my government's belief that we have moved much closer to realizing this agenda.

82. My government has steadfastly sought to accelerate the pace of growth to enable our youth to access global opportunities. Young India has the power to dream big. Our economic progress has enabled such global aspirations. Our investments in knowledge will get us closer to our goals. Our young people have never been more confident about the future. Let our reach exceed our grasp. Jai Hind.

015. Address by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the inauguration of 81st Annual General Meeting of Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry.

New Delhi, February 12, 2009.

Shri Rajeev Chandrasekhar, MP and President, FICCI

Shri Harsh Pati Singhanian, President Elect, FICCI

Shri Rajan Bharati Mittal, Vice President, FICCI

Dr. Amit Mitra, Secretary General, FICCI

Excellencies and Delegates

Captains of Indian Business

Ladies and Gentlemen

It is my great pleasure to inaugurate the 81st AGM of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI). I have enjoyed my interactions with FICCI over the years and I see many friends and familiar faces present here. And this is all the more reason for me to be here.

The theme of your 81st Annual General Meeting - 'Security, Governance and Global Economic Crisis - Challenges for India' - is most appropriate. There is no doubt that we stand at a watershed particularly after 26/11 and the global economic meltdown. The UPA Government has sought to address both the issues of security and growth. I am also happy to state that our Government appointed the Veerappa Moily Committee to address the governance issue. The challenges before India are certainly those of security, governance and how to convert global adversity into a major opportunity for our nation.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Security has long been a matter of serious concern for India, though the nature of threat keeps changing from time to time. This has involved our land and sea borders, political and military establishments, industrial and oil installations, financial centres and economic assets, sea routes and shipping lanes, aviation and maritime security, infrastructure hubs and "iconic targets", security against cyber crimes, etc. In recent decades, India has been a victim of terrorism, including cross-border terrorism. The Mumbai attack of 26/11 was only the most recent and the most gruesome example of this scourge of terrorism that needs to be tackled in a resolute manner. As our Prime Minister has said, "We will spare no effort to deal with terrorist and insurgent groups operating from neighbouring countries. We are determined to put an end to terrorism sponsored from across the border with all the means at our command." Thus, a comprehensive approach needs to be taken to counter this multi-dimensional challenge.

The Government is fully aware and seized of the fact that security is not only of paramount importance in the life of the nation, but is also deeply intertwined with the running of business in our country and that is why the terrorists from Pakistan chose targets that included centres of business and global corporate visitors in Mumbai.

Our Government has, over the past few years, taken a large number of measures, and significant steps to strengthen the apparatus for dealing with the multiple and emerging challenges to our national and internal security. Following the Mumbai terrorist attacks our government has taken a number of immediate steps to address the security issues forthrightly. These include amendments in the law to deal with terrorism while taking care to ensure against any possible misuse; the enactment of a legislation and setting up of a National Investigation Agency (NIA); a decision to establish regional hubs of the NSG in four major metros of the country in a time-bound manner, just to name a few. After a detailed and careful review, strengthening of the mechanism for gathering analysis and real-time sharing of intelligence and coordination among different agencies of the Centre and the States is being effected.

The Prime Minister has chaired a meeting of the State Chief Ministers on Internal Security, with a view to devising measures to integrate the fight against all forms of terror, including the problem of naxalites and insurgency in the North Eastern region. The issue of Police Reforms is being pursued in right earnest. The objective of all these initiatives is to integrate and strengthen the different elements comprising the overall apparatus to fight terrorism and other threats to our internal security.

We are taking a holistic approach in the matter of security and I am glad that FICCI too is focusing on this subject. Our Government seeks a partnership with organizations like FICCI and with the civil society to contain the problem of militancy and stamp out terror.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Let me now move on to the issue of corporate governance. In the recent past, we have seen one most unfortunate case of failure which has attracted considerable attention. We need to ensure that this one single aberration does not undermine either the standing and reputation of our IT industry or India's standing as an emerging trillion dollar economy with the second highest growth rate amongst the major developing countries. The country is an attractive economic partner for the entire world with external trade of approximately US $350 billion and FDI of around US $25 billion per annum. India's IT industry is built on solid fundamentals of our comparative advantage and competitive edge. The adverse fallout of the misdoings in a single company cannot be allowed to cast its shadow on the entire Indian IT industry worth US $ 60 billion or IT exports of around US $ 40 billion.

We sincerely believe that this was a one-off case. I would like to take this opportunity at the FICCI AGM to urge the captains of business and industry sitting in this auditorium and all other corporates across the country to undertake special precautions and due diligence. The Government is committed to providing adequate space or freedom to the corporates for doing business in a healthy and competitive environment. At the same time, it is important that corporates function strictly within the regulatory framework devised and apply the highest standards of ethics in all their working. This would be fully consistent with the norms of corporate best practices and social responsibility. In short, there should never be a repeat of this most unfortunate failure of corporate governance. I firmly believe that even a single such incident is one too many.

All of you are aware that our Government acted swiftly and is doing everything in the domain of investigations, salvaging the livelihoods of thousands of employees, and restoring confidence among clients. We will spare no effort on getting to the bottom of this terrible scam and will take whatever measures are necessary on the basis of the findings. I urge our apex Chambers, including FICCI, to take a leadership role to underscore the imperative need for sound practices and confidence in the functioning of corporates in India.

In this context, I am glad to note that FICCI organized a Conference on the theme 'Administrative Reforms and Ethics in Governance', where my colleague Shri Veerappa Moily presented the findings of the Second Administrative Reforms Commission. In his report - which runs into 11 volumes - he has made some revolutionary suggestions that could bring about a paradigm shift in the way we govern our nation. I am hopeful that this Report will be implemented in letter and spirit. I believe that after implementation of this Report, we would have turned a corner towards a much better structure and governance.

You are also aware that our Government introduced the path-breaking Right to Information (RTI) Act which has empowered common people to seek transparency in governance. FICCI may consider creating a cell that can work as a constructive guide to all businesses and perhaps civil society, to use the RTI Act for enhancing transparency, accountability and finding solutions to problems of governance at the operational level.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The IMF's latest projections for growth show that the advanced economies of the world would shrink by 2% in 2009. While the US economy will contract by 1.6%, the Euro zone economy will decline by 2% and Japan by 2.6% in 2009. I am proud to say that in 2008-09, India will still grow by around 7%.

At the same time, India faces a special challenge from the international financial crisis. In a globalised economy, while India cannot be immune to the impact of the crisis, we have to address this on many fronts. There is a need to sustain our foreign trade, revive foreign investments and generate domestic demand in order to maintain our growth rates which are essential for the uplift of the multitudes below the poverty line. This unprecedented crisis also calls for crafting a new international economic order to put the global economy on a sound footing. India remains committed to working with our foreign partners, including in the G-20 framework, for devising the required comprehensive reforms for a new financial architecture.

As we stand out in the world as one of the key growth centres, I remain confident that we will be able to attract more FDI and that FII flows will return to our markets because this is where growth is happening and this is where profits can be made.

I would like to conclude by saying that there are challenges, formidable challenges, that we face today. But as history has shown, when faced with adversity, India and Indians have risen to the occasion and come out winners. We have the will, the capacity, the resilience - in short the required wherewithal - to convert these challenges into opportunities. We are again in one of those difficult situations, but as always our spirits are high and we will continue to march on the road towards progress and prosperity.

I wish FICCI a great year ahead.

Thank you.

016. Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at National Academy of Statistical Administration (NASA).

New Delhi, February 13, 2009.

Shri G. K. Vasan, Hon'ble Minister of State for Statistics & Programme Implementation

Shri Oscar Fernandes, Minister of State for Labour and Employment

Dr. C Rangarajan, Member of Parliament;

Prof. S. Tendulkar, Chairman of the Prime Minister's Economic Advisory Council and Chairman of the National Statistical Commission;

Dr. Pronab Sen, Chief Statistician of India and Secretary, Ministry of Statistics and Programme Implementation;

Shri S. K. Das, DG, CSO;

Officers and Dignitaries;

Ladies and Gentlemen

At the outset, let me express my gratitude for giving me the privilege to dedicate the National Academy of Statistical Administration (NASA) to the Nation. This institution will be responsible for imparting training and undertaking research in official Statistics, an objective, so important and critical to the improvement of the vital statistical system in the country.

India has a long history of evolution of statistics, not only as a pure science but also as an applied science. The history dates back to Kautilya's Arthashastra, one of the oldest treatises on economics, referencing to system of census and data collection way back in 4th century BC. Its evolution went on with vigour and in its march, contributed significantly to the development of India's post independence development and planning processes. As I stand here, on this occasion of dedicating NASA to the nation, it would be in fitness to remember the great statisticians which this country has produced. Foremost among them is perhaps Prof P C Mahalanobis.

Statistics is all about measurement. At this juncture, when the country is taking rapid strides towards economic development, need for a reliable statistical system to measure its impact on the millions cannot be over emphasized. It is well known that which cannot be measured cannot be managed well. The size of our country, its economy and the complex socio-economic diversities make all activities relating to measurement a daunting task; and also an expensive exercise. It is in this context that the national and the sub-national statistical systems use a judicious mix of administrative data, censuses and nation wide sample surveys, the three components of the statistical system, to evaluate the progress of the country vis-à-vis the goals. The last one in particular - the regular and periodical National Sample Surveys - was an Indian innovation, pioneered by the architect of the existing statistical system in the country, Professor P C Mahalanobis. The beginning made by Prof Mahalanobis, continues to produce reliable national aggregates in a cost effective way, facilitating national planning.

The official statistics provide crucial indicators of the society's overall socio-economic development and hence it acts as an important instrument of measuring good governance. Official Statistics is certainly a powerful tool which empowers the common man, to participate in public scrutiny and debate on the functioning of the governments and facilitates in taking decisions about its success and failures. He uses this to translate his right of choice into a vote - democratic process to which we all are committed to. As it is said, statistics is an estimation of truth, within the specified limits of uncertainty. Thus, it is our responsibility to keep the statistical system strong and vibrant with new techniques and methodologies, strategies, plan and programmes.

Today, almost all over the world, Governments are resorting to evidence based planning for the economic development. In order that planning is successful in meeting its objectives, it must be based on sound analysis of the complex statistical data using appropriate statistical techniques. In these times, administrative statistics is not confined to only the affairs of the State and to the government functionaries. Modern statistical techniques are making way into diversified areas, thereby engaging attention of private sector entities. For this reason it is important to engage ourselves in ensuring credibility of the government statistics, generated from the decentralized statistical system at the national and sub-national level.

Ladies & Gentlemen,

The national economy has been witnessing impressive growth rates and the social sector has been rapidly expanding in all dimensions. During this period, there have been clearly discernible paradigm shifts in the manner in which public policy, schemes and programmes based thereon, have been formulated, implemented, reviewed, monitored and evaluated in India. There are two key dimensions relating to economic and social data that are critical at this juncture. The first relates the degree of aggregation and the second relates to the timeliness.

The recent developments in the global economy underline the importance of ensuring that data on key economic indicators are made available in a timely manner at varying levels of disaggregation. This calls for rethink on the strategy for data collection, compilation and its dissemination that is useful to policy makers so that they are able to base their decisions on data and evidence that is current rather than extrapolating from the past. At the same time, valuable information and insights that could be derived from data that is collected often gets irretrievably lost by virtue of aggregation. Timely dissemination of data at greater levels of disaggregation, no doubt, within the bounds of propriety, needs to be explored so that information at a more detailed level may be meaningfully used for policy making, research and also by those responsible for implementing programmes in the field.

The ongoing financial crisis that originated in the US and transmitted to the rest of the World, with amazing swiftness and intensity has highlighted the criticality of ensuring that data on key economic variables are collected, disseminated, interpreted and monitored with greater frequency. This is not only true of financial and monetary variables, but also of variables like savings, consumption, employment, that are conventionally thought to possess huge inertia with respect to change. Time lags in their collection and dissemination lead to unreliable estimates, approximations and questionable extension of available time series. Such a situation also gives room to anecdotal evidence, incomprehensive sample studies and perhaps incorrect guidance for making mid-course policy corrections.

Therefore, it is important to urgently institute mechanisms to generate statistically acceptable short-frequency data, consistent at different tiers of collection and aggregation, for the regular use of economic administrators. We also need to equip economic administrators to appropriately interpret the data at hand. Addressing these issues necessitates immense efforts at capacity creation, harnessing private abilities and lead roles to be performed by national agencies such as NASA.

Like the federal governance, the National Statistical System, in a major way has a similar responsibility to take along with it the state level statistical systems, meeting their training requirements for all those involved in management of their system. The National Government is committed towards this end and would be ready to take further steps. I am confident that NASA will play a pivotal role towards creating professionally trained statistical manpower to manage the field level challenges of data collection, timely collation, and dissemination. I am also convinced that NASA will fill the gaps which our educational institutions are unable to bridge, that is exposing young students of statistics to the practical application of statistical methods. This will not only capture the innovative minds of the young but would also help create a pool of talent to meet the increasing demand for statistical persons, not only in the government but also in the private sector.

The setting up of NASA and its full fledged operationalisation from today are important initiatives of the Ministry of Statistics and Programme Implementation and a positive contribution towards the development of our country for which I deeply appreciate my colleague Shri Vasan.

In conclusion, I hope that the Academy would transform the experience of training - for the trainees as well as the trainers, in a manner that when they walk out of the Academy, they are not only enriched in statistical tools and techniques, but also develop a unique outlook of life. An outlook that uses the facts only to be subservient to the truth. It is only then that we can say to have served statistics and served through statistics in the true sense.

Thank you.

017. Interview of the Minister of State for External Affairs Anand Sharma with the journalists of the Indian Express.

New Delhi, February 15, 2009.

- Seema Chishti: You have your hands full juggling two key ministries*. Can you tell us a bit about that?

Anand Sharma: The last few years and in particular, the last few months, have been interesting and challenging. We have been able to articulate with clarity India's position on many issues which are of global interest. We have also been able to make an impact as a country which has a rightful aspiration for a global leadership position in this century. It was Indian diplomacy which helped us to convince the world about India's impeccable credentials and commitment to non-proliferation when we first carried along the IAEA and later the Nuclear Suppliers' Group. That was one of the most hectic periods for us. Another was when we took the initiative to commemorate the centenary of the Satyagraha in 2006-7. We held the biggest conference that independent India ever hosted though it was outside the government ambit. One integral component of that declaration was to ask the United Nations to declare Mahatma Gandhi's birthday as the International Day of Non-Violence. The convening of a special UN session was one of the great moments, a humbling experience but a very proud one too as I moved the resolution.

At the Information and Broadcasting ministry; I stepped in because of Priya Ranjan Dasmunsi's grave illness four months ago. Major decisions have been made, many of the pending issues resolved, including the problems of Prasar Bharati employees which hadn't been resolved for 12 years.

- Saubhik Chakrabarti: Would it be fair to say at this point, that whatever Pakistan does now on the Mumbai attack issue, we will not get a resolution satisfactory to the Indian government?

There cannot be two solutions. There can be only one solution—that Pakistan comes across openly and honestly to deliver on the commitments and assurances that it has given to India bilaterally and also to the international community. The satisfactory solution could have been the handing over of the masterminds who have been identified and named not only by us but by other countries including USA, UK, Germany, by the UN Security Council itself. And that raises a question mark over whether they have the will and seriousness to dismantle the terror syndicate that operates from Pakistan, which, eventually, threatens this entire region and the world.

* Mr. Anand Sharma was holding dual charge as Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs and Ministry of Information and Broadcasting.

- Saubhik Chakrabarti: From the point of view of your government and from the point of view of the country, is there any reason to assume that the pattern might change given what we are seeing from Islamabad?

The organisations which were banned, proscribed by the United Nations, whether it is the Jamat-ud-Dawa, Lashkar-e-Toiba, Jaish-e-Mohammad, all these organisations are banned but they have a free run. It's about changing the signboards, locking the front gate and opening the side door. That is truly disturbing and disappointing.

- Dhiraj Nayyar: One of the big stories in international diplomacy in the last 10-15 years has been China's aggressive foray into Africa. Do you think we have been a bit slow off the mark in reaching out to Africa?

India's engagement with Africa is time-tested, it is rooted in history. There is a better understanding about India in Africa. And if I can just use one word, India is trusted. India has identified itself with the struggle of Africa, we have been there acting in solidarity when they were in pain, right from the days of Mahatma Gandhi. We have been a partner in Africa's progress and development, open and willing to share our resources, our experience, our technology. India's engagement, therefore, is distinct and different from the engagement of any country with Africa, including China or for that matter the countries in Europe and in Americas.

India started sharing its resources, we started scholarship schemes, the IT programme and in these last four-five decades, tens of thousands of students from Africa have come to India. That was the wisdom of our leadership which invested in human resources in Africa. There are 50,000 African students studying in India even now, there are scholarships at even IITs and IIMs.

In addition, we have encouraged both the public sector and the private sector to go there. The Indian private sector has followed ethical practices and that is the difference. If you see an Indian project coming up, the executing company would be the local companies. Employment is generated for the local people, they are enabled and they are trained. Companies have picked up raw graduates from the universities, brought them to India, trained them and taken them back. So it is truly empowering the local people. And also it generates income. Another important area where India took the initiative was in pharmaceuticals in Africa. The suffocating stranglehold of the multinationals was broken by the Indians and the battleground was again Africa, where a patient's anti-retroviral drug would cost about $11-12000 dollars a year. It is now close to $ 600.

Pan African e-network project is a shining example of India's partnership with Africa. It is an Indian satellite to help sub-Saharan Africa bridge the digital divide for e-connectivity. Institutions, hospitals in seven distinct regions in Africa have been linked with super-specialty hospitals of India, universities of Africa have been linked with the major universities of India.

- Dheeraj Nayyar: India's policy towards Myanmar has changed. We supported Aung San Su Kyi but due to China's exploitation of commercial interests in Myanmar, we had to engage with the military leadership. Is China's aggression eventually going to force us to be not so nice to Africa?

I don't think so. Look at our neighbourhood. We do not have the luxury and comfort of a quiet, benign neighbourhood. Our problem is that we cannot afford to be prescriptive to one neighbour and not to the other. We had a military dictatorship in Pakistan until recently. Similarly, there was the military in Bangladesh until the elections were held. As far as India is concerned, we will support democracy. In Myanmar, we have been impressing upon having an inclusive regime and taking forward the processes of reform by taking everyone along. Every country's foreign policy takes into account its own security, its own strategic national interests. When we say we engage with the world, our engagement with one country is not at the cost of the other. A country like India, given our profile, has to conduct a foreign policy which reaches out to the world, influences important events. That is what India is seeking to do.

- Anubhuti Vishnoi: The I&B ministry wasn't happy with the media coverage of the Mumbai attacks. Do you think the self-regulatory authority of the broadcasters would be an effective watchdog in situations similar to Mumbai?

When the Mumbai attacks were going on, the coverage was 24x7. There were mistakes made by the administration. There should have been standard protocols, authorised spokespersons, areas should have been sanitised as it is done elsewhere in the world.

But there were sharp reactions from the civil society on the media coverage and equally strong reactions from the judiciary and a public statement from the Chief Justice of India. On November 27, after we received a written communication from the security agencies, we called in the captains of the electronic media, and stakeholders from the government-from security to intelligence agencies. That helped in sensitising both the sides to each other's concerns. The broadcasters' association said they would make amends.

- Alia Allana: In the UAE, 20,000 people have been fired following the recession. They have no laws, no guidelines on how to treat people from India. We have done nothing for our people.

We have to look at the larger, global picture. There are mounting job losses in the USA. The number is now closer to perhaps what it was during the Great Depression. It's the same in Europe. So it's not just in the Gulf that it is happening to the Indians. But we are worried-the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has already created a special fund to deal with these eventualities. We hope that the situation improves but in the foreseeable future, it does not look like that. But Indians are not being singled out and sent back. It is worrisome, however, since we have a large number of Indian citizens in the Gulf and their remittances are huge.

- Seema Chishti: After the Mumbai incident and in our current problems with Pakistan, how constrained are you by the fact that we are heading into a general election? Does that influence the handling of this matter?

As far as we are concerned, India has been attacked, India has been assaulted, it is the dignity of the Indian nation that has been assaulted but India has acted with remarkable restraint and maturity. At the same time, what has been said by the leadership is that our restraint must not be misconstrued for India's weakness or inability. What we have done is to inform the entire international community. We have never used a threatening word but we are saying: don't mistake this as a weakness. Any government has a duty to protect its citizens and to reassure its citizens. So it is a message being given with clarity. India did not walk into the trap when Pakistan wanted to deflect the world's attention by creating a war hype.

- Seema Chishti: Has the mysterious telephone call to President Zardari been solved?

I think it is absolutely absurd for anybody to suggest that such a call could be made. That too, to the President of a country by the senior-most minister in the Indian government. Even if a call is to be made by me or to me, it is pre-arranged by our mission in that country and the foreign office here. A time is given and the time is tallied. It is very clear who will be on the line in my office and who will be on the other side. It is unthinkable that you can pick up the phone and dial the President of another country.

So many things were said in Pakistan: that India has moved its forces, etc. This was to create global panic. They shouldn't have done it. They should have said right in the beginning that we condemn the Mumbai attack-which they said-and that we will take action. Why did they go into denial mode? This flip-flop is hurting. They already have very poor credibility. Instead of restoring it they are eroding it further.

New Delhi, February 18, 2009.

The Minister of External Affairs and Minister of Finance (Shri Pranab Mukherjee): Mr. Speaker Sir, at the very outset, I would like to express my gratitude to all the hon. Members including the Leader of the Opposition who have participated in this discussion on the Motion of Thanks on the President's Address. I would also like to join them to express our gratitude to the hon. President of India for her inspiring Address.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I would not like to take much more time of the House but on certain things, for which I am directly responsible for the last three years, which has been discussed in details, in the President's Address, as is customary about the foreign policy. It has been criticized that India's foreign policy has lost its independence. What are the criteria? "We are not supporting the Non-Aligned Movement. We are not supporting the Palestinian cause. We are under the influence of a particular country." Most respectfully, I would like to submit, Mr. Speaker, Sir, on every occasion, I repeat, on every occasion, whenever there has been an attack on innocent Palestinian people at Gaza by the Israeli armed forces, India's voice was first to launch protest. We believed that many years ago we committed that Palestinians must have their homelands within a definitive territory and there should not be any encroachment. We have supported all the peace process - four important Resolutions of the United Nations Security Council, Arab League Initiatives, Initiatives recently taken by the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Qatar Initiative. India has fully supported all these initiatives and India is fully committed. It is our declared policy. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Basu Deb Acharia: Why has Israeli not been mentioned in the Address? ... (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: That is not the point. What have you said? You said that we have not criticized, we have forgotten.

About Non-Aligned Movement, Shri Salim is present, though it was widely covered in the Indian media. ... (Interruptions) In the Foreign Ministers' Conference of Non-Aligned Movement at Teheran, I have made observations. I would be glad to share with Shri Salim and other friends, including Left friends.

So, coming back to the foreign policy, it is independent. Yes, we have our interest to promote; we are interested to promote not the interest of anybody else, but our own national interest. That means, foreign policy is nothing, but the extension of the national interest and promotion of national interest in the context of the external atmosphere and external environment.

Today, exactly we are doing so. The attention which we are getting is not because of the gratitude of somebody or because some countries are favouring us. From day one, when Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru enunciated the foreign policy of this great country which is based on our civilisation and which is based on our tradition, we are pursuing the policies of non-alignment. We are pursuing the policies of friendly relations with each and every country. We are pursuing the policies of persuasion and not coercion. In the 1983-84, Non-Aligned Summit, late Shrimati Indiraji said that we have no interest either in exporting our ideology or we have no interest in the territory of others and the basis of our foreign policy is to protect our own interest and to protect the interest of the down-trodden all over the world. We have never deviated from that. It may be that the great leaders like Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru or Indiraji or Rajiv Gandhiji, the way they could have articulated, the way they could have listened... (Interruptions). Today also we are listened to in our own respect... (Interruptions). It is not past. It is the present and it will also be the future... (Interruptions)

How much time we can give to Pakistan? Pakistan has admitted this. When we said that non-State actors are not coming from Heavens, they had to admit it. They have admitted it. Most respectfully I would say that diplomacy has played and diplomacy has not failed. At least, we know that and all the Members sitting here know that we did not mobilize a single soldier. We did not press the panic button. We did not lay mines all along the border but we said that we expect Pakistan to fulfil its commitment. We said it on 28th November when I had my telephonic conversation with Pakistan Foreign Minister, Mr. Qureshi and the following day it was sent in the form of a Speaking Note to their High Commissioner. We have not deviated and they have informed us in the month of February that they admit it. Their Home Minister said it in his Press Conference and many of you must have heard it. But that does not mean that I have to rub them on the wrong side. I understand the complexity of the Pakistan situation, as many people do. The Leader of the Opposition comes from that part of the world. He knows it much better... (Interruptions). I am not yielding. I am making my observation. You may have your own views.... (Interruptions)

Kindly go through what I stated in Parliament. My memory is not short. When you asked why do you not attack Pakistan, I replied that it is not the solution and that it would not solve the problem. I am repeating it. On the very first day when I made the statement I said it.

I mentioned this when this issue was debated and in response to his query, I stated this. It is on the record of Parliament. Then why is he getting unnecessarily agitated and why is he putting words into my mouth? We shall have to try and unless the perpetrators, I am repeating what I said, unless the perpetrators of this terror attack are brought to justice; unless the infrastructure available to the terror actors in Pakistan are completely dismantled which will be verifiable and credible not only to us but to the international community, we will continue to demand that from Pakistan. It is the responsibility of the incumbent Government, however compulsive it may be, to respond to it.

Infiltration of people from Bangladesh, the Leader of the Opposition mentioned about it, yes, it is true that infiltrations are taking place. There is porous border. There is a 4096 kilometres of land border and the partition was based on the Radcliff Award which the Leader of the Opposition is fully aware of this. It was so unscientific that sometimes villages were divided between two countries and over the last 60 years, there have been major demographic changes in many areas and there is no land available to make the distinction. Therefore, the fencing work is getting disturbed. But we are carrying on the fencing work. These initiatives had been taken earlier and we are taking it to its logical conclusion. Construction of border roads, floodlighting those areas, enhancing the number of border posts is some of the preventive measures that are being taken to prevent infiltration. Very recently, we have handed over about 100,000 people to the BSF, not at one go but in different phases, to send them back to Bangladesh. But sometimes it is happening. It is also a major human problem. We are pushing them back in one way and after some time they are coming back in some other way and again infiltration is taking place. But I do not minimise the importance of this problem but at the same time I would not like to just over-emphasise this issue. Some observations have been made. I would not like to repeat it. I mentioned it when I replied to the debate initiated by the Leader of the Opposition in respect of the IMDT Act. But what have we to do? It does not mean that if we amend the Constitution, if we amend the law in conformity with the observations of the Supreme Court, it is perfectly constitutional. How was the first amendment to the Indian Constitution brought about? Shri Chidambaram is a constitutional lawyer and he will bear with me, the first amendment was brought in to nullify a court judgement. The first amendment took place and again somebody challenged the validity of that amendment because even Council of States, the Rajya Sabha was not constituted then. It was constituted, I think, either in the late 1950 or early 1951. I do not remember the exact year. These are the parts and these are the processes and are perfectly legal and constitutional. But the Election Commission, the Supreme Court, the Members of Parliament, the Comptroller and Auditor General when they are appointed, they are just Civil Servants, but the moment they assume office, they enjoy the special constitutional powers.

019. Interview of External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee With the Khaleej Times.

February 25, 2009.

Q1. India has termed encouraging Islamabad's response to Mumbai terror attack dossier. Do you think Pakistan is doing enough to cooperate with New Delhi in Mumbai attacks? How do you respond to Islamabad's reply? What do you expect consequently from Pakistan?

Ans: Pakistani authorities have admitted that elements in Pakistan were involved in the terrorist attacks on Mumbai. They have arrested some persons and filed an FIR. This is a positive first step. Pakistan has also sought further information and material relating to the investigation. We will share whatever we can with Pakistan. However, the process should not be allowed to become an end in itself. We expect Pakistan to act against the perpetrators of the Mumbai attack on the basis of evidence shared with her.

The wider issue is dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism in Pakistan. Several questions arise in the aftermath of the Mumbai attacks. How did an already banned terrorist group (LeT alias JUD) carry out such an attack? Why did it have the latitude to do so? Are there other such groups? It is for the Government of Pakistan to answer these questions and act on them.

In general, I would like to reaffirm that this issue should not be looked through the prism of India-Pakistan relations. Terrorism is a global issue. It affects not only India, but the entire world. Terrorists have no ideology or religion. Terrorism is the biggest threat to world peace and security in the post-Cold War era. It needs to be countered firmly by the entire international community.

Q2. India for long has been calling on Pakistan to close terror camps in the country. You have also called on for Islamabad to deliver on its commitment to prevent terrorism directed at India from its territory. But your government says this belief has not lead to any tangible results so far. Where and how do you see India's relations going with Pakistan?

Ans: Pakistan had committed to us on 6th January 2004 and on 24th September 2008, at the highest level, that it would not permit territory under its control to be used for terrorism in any manner. Our Composite Dialogue process, started in 2004, was premised on this commitment. Clearly Pakistan has not kept its word. The Composite Dialogue process with Pakistan has been paused. No meeting has taken place and neither are any scheduled. Substantial gains, made during the last four or five years, in normalizing our relations, are at risk. Future progress in our bilateral relations depends on Pakistan's response not only in words but also through substantive actions.

Q3: Your Army Chief, the National Security Advisor, and most importantly even the Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh, have said that Pakistan's official agencies –ISI and other state actors were linked up in the Mumbai terror attacks. Do you think Pakistan must take actions against these state actors? What do you mean when you say that the case must be brought to a 'logical conclusion'?

Ans: For us "logical conclusion" means perpetrators of terrorist acts are brought to book. Terror network and infrastructure should be dismantled completely to prevent the repetition of attacks in future. Fugitives from Indian law who are in Pakistan should be handed over. I need not repeat what has been said earlier. Surely terrorist groups cannot be allowed to flourish while we are given 'solemn' commitments against terrorism.

Q4: When India's Kabul embassy was attacked, New Delhi affirmed having sufficient evidence against ISI's involvement in the commencement of hostilities carried out by Taliban. Do you really think Pakistan establishment is in a position to crack down against ISI or any of their state actors, who may have been involved against such attacks directed at India? What is your assessment?

Ans: After the attack on our Embassy in Kabul, the Pakistan Prime Minister promised to the Prime Minister of India that he would have an independent investigation conducted into the attack. To date we have not received any response from Pakistan. I have been saying that I am not unaware of the internal complexities of Pakistan. But we cannot bear the brunt of their internal situation. It is the sovereign duty of that Government to act against those on its territory who commit terrorist acts elsewhere. That responsibility cannot be wished away.

Q5: Pakistan President Asif Ali Zardari has said that Pakistan is 'fighting its battle for survival'. Don't you think Pakistan should be given some more time, and also international community should be more sympathetic to Pakistan that is seemingly battling against the rise of radical Islamic fundamentalism, and militancy?

Ans: We have shown immense patience and exercised utmost restraint in our response despite tremendous outrage amongst our people. The issue is not of more time or of sympathy. Those factors come into play after a certain policy direction is taken. The issue is of the direction of change in Pakistan. If banned groups are not just tolerated, but allowed to flourish and if even today agreements are being reached with other banned groups, can we take it as an unambiguous position against terrorism?

Q6: There is a strong belief that international pressure, and also diplomatic compulsion against Pakistan has worked in India's advantage. It is felt that Pakistan has responded to the dossier only under the pressure of the United States. How much of this is due to American influence really, sir?

Ans: Pakistani leaders have been saying that Pakistan is taking action not under any external pressure but in its own interest. It is not for me to comment on their sovereign decisions, or on what is triggering action there.

However, we are grateful for the tremendous outpouring of support from our friends in international community, including the United States. After the attacks, I have personally spoken to my counterparts in over 25 countries, and have sent a dossier of evidence to all my counterparts. We have also kept open the channel of communication with Pakistan, through our respective High Commissioners. Our approach is constructive, and is showing results.

As I have said earlier, the attacks were a cold blooded act of terrorism. Such terrorism is a global menace. If it is tackled purposefully, the entire world including Pakistan would gain.

Q7: India's opposition parties say New Delhi has outsourced diplomacy to America. Don't you think this could be the result of an impression being created that India is totally dependent on Washington given its strong and ever expanding bilateral ties with the US, especially post Indo-US civilian nuclear deal?

Ans: We have an independent foreign policy, based on our national interests. Our relations with the USA, as with other countries in the world, are determined by our national interests. The US is our largest trading and investment partner. The Indo-US nuclear deal is a result of the trust and confidence that the two countries repose in each other. Indian IT industry exports 60% of its services to the United States. We have a 2.5 million strong Indian community in the United States.

There is no question of dependence on any one country. However, it is in the common interest of the international community, to purposefully and collectively deal with pressing global issues – international terrorism, food and energy security, climate change, global financial reforms and UN reforms.

Q8: What is your thought about US President Barack Obama's policy on the region so far? The US seems to be mounting enough pressure on Pakistan to seek their support in their global war against terrorism. Are you satisfied with Washington's approach towards this?

Ans: President Obama's focus on Afghanistan and Pakistan in its fight against international terrorism converges in many ways with India's own belief that elements operating from Pakistan and the Taliban-controlled areas of Afghanistan are the biggest source of international terrorism, which threatens the civilized world. We hope that US policies in Pakistan would be directed at the elimination of terrorist elements that have taken root in territories under Pakistan's control and have been allowed unfettered growth over many years. We hope Pakistan will act decisively before it is too late.

Q9: Some sections within your government were apprehensive about President Obama's policy. The very fact that President Obama equated Kashmir issue, and considered it as the root of all problems in South Asia made your government diffident. Why do you think Kashmir issue cannot be associated or linked with the issue of terrorism?

Ans: Kashmir is an integral part of India. It is a bilateral issue between India and Pakistan, to be resolved through direct dialogue. There is no place for any third party involvement in India-Pakistan ties.

In the last few years, the Government of India has taken several initiatives including confidence building measures like facilitation of cross-border movement of people, trade, improved connectivity between Jammu & Kashmir and Pakistan occupied Kashmir (PoK) - and between India and Pakistan - with a view to creating a conducive atmosphere for the composite dialogue with Pakistan - to resolve the pending issues.

Recently, we held successful, free and fair elections in Jammu & Kashmir, where the voter turn-out was over 60%. The people of Kashmir did not heed to the boycott calls given by separatist elements. They spoke loud and clear through the ballot box, giving the separatists elements a fitting reply. They voted for peace, security and development in a democratic framework.

Q10: Kashmir remained the core issue, even when India and Pakistan decided to go ahead with their composite dialogue process. Many of the Confidence Building Measures (CBMs) are centric to Kashmir. The Indo-Pak peace process did achieve its purpose to an extent in bringing people from both the sides together. How do you think the negativity, and hostility, is affecting the Indo-Pak ties, post Mumbai attacks?

Ans: During the past four and half years with the Composite Dialogue process, more was achieved than in the preceding fifty years of India-Pakistan relations. We are with the people of Pakistan and we want the democratic government of Pakistan to succeed. Post Mumbai, we have deliberately not thought it fit to curtail people to people contacts or trains and road links. Nevertheless the dialogue and normalization process has suffered a setback. Our dialogue process was proceeding well because it was popular. But if Pakistan does not take credible action against terrorist groups whose sole aim is wanton destruction, it cannot be hidden from people. A negative approach cannot but lead to erosion in popular support for a dialogue process.

Q11: India under its fairly independent and non-aligned foreign policy has had exceptionally good ties with Iran and Afghanistan. The US says their focus is on Afghanistan, while India feels it is Pakistan that needs attention first. What are India's agenda in the given situation, and why do you think the region is so important for India?

Ans: We cherish our relations with Iran and Afghanistan. They face today the same kinds of threat from terrorism as we do. It has been and it will be our endeavor to have good-neighbourly relations with all our neighbors for peaceful coexistence. The situation in the Pakistan Afghanistan border regions is a matter of great concern for us, as it is for other members of the international community. In our view the issue is of facing the threat in a united manner with as broad a unity amongst all countries as can be achieved.

Q12: Israel's massive offence in Gaza didn't get much attention in India. As long as Yasser Arafat was alive, he frequently visited India, and inevitably returned with the country's unflinching support to the Palestine cause. Do you see India's growing ties with Israel affecting its relations with the Arab world? What is your view?

Ans: Chairman Arafat is always remembered by us as a great leader of his people and a friend of India. A well-established tradition of high-level exchanges with Palestine has continued with the State visit of President Mahmoud Abbas four months ago.

Our support for the Palestinian cause has been consistent, dating back to our pre-independence days. India has always supported the peaceful resolution of the conflict in West Asia resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine, living within secure and recognized borders, side by side and at peace with Israel. India supports the Arab Peace Initiative. India has also called for an end to the expansion of Israeli settlements in occupied Palestinian territories and for an early and significant easing of restrictions on the free movement of persons and goods.

During the recent conflict in the Gaza Strip, we called for an immediate end to the disproportionate and condemnable use of force, particularly against civilians, and for the restoration of peace. In response to a 'Flash Appeal' from the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, the Government of India contributed US$ 1 million for humanitarian relief. At various international fora, including NAM, the United Nations Human Rights Commission, etc., India has strongly and consistently supported the Palestinian cause. We have also been in touch with our friends in the Arab world on the Palestinian issue.

I also wish to emphasize that our bilateral relations with no country is conducted at the expense of our relations with any other country. It has always been our endeavour to maintain and develop good relations with all.

Q13: India has joined hands with United Arab Emirates in counter terrorism. What makes you think that UAE can be a decisive ally of India in its fight against terrorism, and intercontinental crime?

Ans: India has close relationship with all the GCC countries, with which we hold regular consultations at the official and political levels. Counter-terrorism is one of the major issues which has been figuring during these consultations. UAE is a key transit country for international trade and travel in our region; therefore it has and is playing, a critical role in combating international terrorism. We are currently holding discussions, with UAE, to conclude an agreement/MOU for cooperation on combating terrorism, to put in place an institutional mechanism.

Q14: How do you see India's relationship with Sri Lanka, especially in view of what has been happening in the country, where scores of civilians from Tamil origin are caught up in the gun battle... of Sri Lanka's war against the LTTE rebels?

Ans: Sri Lanka is a close and friendly neighbour. Relationship between our two countries is multi dimensional and cuts across a range of areas and issues such as trade, culture, tourism, science & technology, people-to-people exchanges and development projects etc.

As far as the humanitarian situation in Northern Sri Lanka is concerned, the fact that civilians and internally displaced persons are caught up with the conflict is a matter of serious concern for us. I visited Sri Lanka last month to take up this matter, and indeed other issues as well, with the Sri Lankan Government. I stressed the need to ensure the safety and security of the civilians, including giving them an opportunity to come out to safe areas, expanding and respecting safe zones in the area of conflict, and ensuring that there was no shelling into the safe zones. You would recollect that after my visit, President Rajapaksa announced a 48-hour period where he had given an opportunity for these civilians to come out to safer areas.

We continue to maintain the need for a negotiated political settlement of the issues acceptable to all communities in Sri Lanka, including the Tamil community. We have urged the Sri Lankan Government to work towards this end and start the political process urgently. We also stand ready to contribute towards the reconstruction and rehabilitation of northern Sri Lanka.

Q15: You are the senior most leader in the Congress party. Parliamentary elections in India are to be held soon. Seeing your admirable relations with the Left leaders, there is a talk that a beginning has been made to woo the Left to support the next Congress led coalition. What do you have to say?

Ans: My answer is simple. What will happen in post election scenario will depend on how the numbers add up. It is too early to speculate on this. Along with other UPA partners we are hopeful of a comfortable majority.

Distinguished guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure to deliver this inaugural address at the International Conference on "Cooperative Development, Peace and Security in South and Central Asia", organized by the Centre for Research in Rural and Industrial Development (CRRID), Chandigarh, The Global India Foundation and the Maulana Abul Kalam Azad Institute of Asian Studies, Kolkata. Jadavpur University has very graciously made available the premises for holding the conference. I would also like to acknowledge the presence of the distinguished Indian and foreign participants, who are attending this seminar. I am sure your contributions will be valuable inputs in the deliberations of this conference.

At the outset, let me congratulate the organizers for selecting this critically important theme. If the countries of South Asia form India's immediate neighbourhood, Central Asia is part of our extended neighbourhood. The region is an enormous landmass. Bonds of geography, history, culture and values tie the peoples of this region together. All through the region, efforts are underway to achieve the common good through greater exchanges at multiple levels - Governmental, Parliamentary, academic, cultural and most importantly at the level of peoples through the promotion of tourism, commerce and cooperation in the field of education. These efforts have to be accelerated for the region to confront its common challenges - poverty alleviation, health, education and industrialization. It is also our firm conviction that internal stability and economic progress in all our neighbouring countries is in India's interest. It is only through shared economic development that we can achieve our objectives of lasting peace and security.

Growth and development are closely intertwined with peace and security. Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru had once said "without peace, all other dreams vanish and are reduced to ashes". Terrorism, extremism and fundamentalism are posing a serious threat to peace and security in our region, be it India, Afghanistan, Uzbekistan or Tajikistan. The propagation of intolerance and hatred, and the resultant terrorism, is the greatest threat to world peace and security in the post-Cold War era. The terrorist attacks in Mumbai were one more manifestation of terrorism in our region. It is imperative that all governments of the region take urgent, proactive measures to eliminate terrorism in all its forms and manifestations so that these forces do not derail the processes of progress and prosperity. Pakistan in particular should fully cooperate to bring those guilty of the conspiracy behind Mumbai attacks to justice. It is essential that Pakistan takes decisive action to effectively root out terrorism from territories under its control.

Ladies and gentlemen,

Let me now touch upon some of the overarching complementarities among the countries of this region. Firstly, food security has been recognized as an important challenge for our region and the world. South Asia has some of the most densely populated areas in the world while Central Asia has some very sparsely populated areas. The Conference could look at joint efforts between the countries of this region to bolster mutual goals for their food security.

Secondly, energy security is another big challenge of modern times. The hydropower surplus of Central Asia in summer months fits in smoothly with the shortages in those periods in South Asian states. Of course, the production and transmission capacities would need to be built and feasibility of the investments required would need expert assessment. The Asian Development Bank has done some work in this field. In the area of hydrocarbons, there is a meshing of interests between India and other countries of South Asia as consumers and countries such as Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan as suppliers.

Thirdly, India has gained entrepreneurial experience over the years in many areas which are of relevance to the development of Central Asia. These include mining, metallurgy, engineering, automobiles and consumer goods. There have been some success stories of Indian investments in the region in the textile, metals and construction sectors, which could be replicated. Cooperation in such sectors as leather, chemicals, pharmaceuticals, finance, capital markets and services can be explored. Besides, India offers a large market for all our neighbours. We need to identify ways of enhancing trade flows, which depend on physical connectivities, banking linkages, governmental regulation and administrative procedures. It would be in the common interest of all our countries to promote these connectivities and interlinkages amongst us. I hope that you would evaluate opportunities existing for intra-regional trade through expanding transport routes and simplifying transit processes among countries of South and Central Asia.

Lastly, human resource development is vital for the progress of any country. India's ITEC programme offers short-term training programmes in the fields of IT, management, entrepreneurship, English language, finance and others to about 500 candidates from Central Asia. India has undertaken several small-scale developmental and human resource projects in the region and we would be pleased to further share our knowledge with our neighbors. Several countries in the region have attained notable progress in education and science, and greater cooperation in these areas would be in our common interest. We need to find mechanisms to promote this process through greater exchange of students, scholars and cooperative programmes.

Ladies and gentlemen,

I will now touch upon our relations with individual countries of the region, as also some important regional structures. In South Asia, we have continued to strengthen our bilateral relations with our neighbours. I believe we have been generally successful in this endeavour, with the exception of Pakistan, though we do not, in any way, discount the potential of close and friendly relations with them in future.

We remain committed to support the people and the Government of Nepal in consolidating the democratic transition and in its developmental efforts. With Nepal, we see immense long-term mutual benefits in the areas of greater linkages and connectivity, better border infrastructure and mutually beneficial cooperation in the area of hydro-power. With Sri Lanka, our relations are marked by a broad-based improvement across all sectors including trade and investment, education, tourism and people-to-people exchanges. As regards the ethnic conflict, we believe that the Sri Lankan military success should be quickly followed by a political solution involving a credible devolution that will meet the legitimate aspirations of all communities, including the Tamils, within the framework of a united Sri Lanka. In the interim, we have appealed to the Sri Lankan government to work out appropriate and credible procedures for the evacuation of Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) to safety. We are providing all necessary help including humanitarian relief and medical care.

We welcomed the successful elections in Bangladesh, as a resounding victory of democracy. The people of Bangladesh have given a clear mandate and reposed full faith in the newly elected government under the leadership of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. During my visit to Dhaka last month, I discussed the whole gamut of our bilateral relations, including issues related to security, border management, connectivity and promoting trade, investment and people-to-people level contacts.

We have welcomed the voluntary and peaceful transition to democracy in Bhutan. Our relations with Bhutan are truly a model of bilateral cooperation, which will strengthen even further in the years ahead.

As regards Afghanistan, despite the serious deterioration in the internal security situation, which impinge directly on India, we have continued our reconstruction and development assistance programmes. With over US$ 1.2 billion assistance, we are the 6th largest bilateral donor in that country. I recently inaugurated the Zaranj-Delaram road which will provide better access to the country through Iran.

With Pakistan, notwithstanding important achievements in the Composite Dialogue Process over the last four years, their non-implementation of solemn commitments given to us, i.e., not to permit territory under their control to support terrorism, has placed our dialogue process under stress. Pakistan's response of February 12, admitting that elements in Pakistan were involved in the Mumbai attacks, is a positive first step. At the same time, they need to do more. The perpetrators of the attacks should be brought to justice and Pakistan must dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism in its territory in order to prevent recurrence of such attacks. Until these actions are taken, the threat of terrorism from Pakistan will remain a major challenge to India and the region. However, I would like to also underline here that we have consciously decided not to discontinue people-to-people level contacts and road and rail links, and have kept open the channel of communication with them.

Coming to Central Asia, I am happy to state that India has excellent relations with all the five countries of the region. Bilateral institutional mechanisms by way of Inter-Governmental Commissions and Foreign Office Consultations exist with all Central Asian countries. Building on our strong historical and civilizational links with these countries, today we have friendly, cooperative and more contemporary ties with them. The importance we attach to Central Asia is reflected in the visit of President Nazarbayev of Kazakhstan who was the Chief Guest at the Republic Day celebrations this year. After the independence of their respective countries, President Nazarbayev and President Karimov of Uzbekistan visited India on their first official visits abroad highlighting the importance attached to India by the Central Asian leadership. Although there has been steady increase in bilateral trade with this region, the volume of trade remains unsatisfactory. There are enormous possibilities for increasing bilateral trade and investments and for greater economic cooperation generally. India's experience in boosting food production, including milk production and modernizing agro-techniques could also be relevant for Central Asia. Absence of direct surface transportation routes with this landlocked region has been a constraint in further developing economic and trade ties.

Trade through the Iranian port of Bandar Abbas under the framework of International North-South Transport Corridor (set up jointly by India, Russia and Iran) is under discussion. There is air connectivity with Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan and Turkmenistan through direct flights with Indian cities. However, the existing flight connections have the potential for expansion in terms of capacity and frequency. Unfortunately, there is no Indian carrier flying into the region though we are trying to encourage such flights. We also have cooperation with some Central Asian countries in the field of defence, primarily for training of military personnel in India.

At the regional level, regional organizations provide useful structures for promoting joint endeavours. SAARC has made notable progress in bringing South Asian countries together over the last twenty-three years. The SAARC development fund has made a promising beginning. We have agreed on moving towards a South Asian Customs Union and Economic Union; established a SAARC Food Bank; are improving physical connectivity; and are establishing a South Asian university. On their part, the Central Asian countries are working together under the rubric of Shanghai Cooperation Organization and Eurasian Economic Community. The Conference on Interactions and Confidence building measures in Asia (CICA) brings most South and Central Asian countries together into a mechanism for expanding cooperation and development. Thus, requisite institutional structures are in place to give an impetus to cooperation across the region.

Ladies and gentlemen,

In conclusion, I would like to say that secularism and tolerance, which are concomitant with peace and progress of our pluralistic societies, have been the hallmark of South and Central Asia for a long time. These norms and customs have come under considerable pressure from extremist and fundamentalist forces. I believe that apart from the government, scholars and think tanks have a crucial role to play to promote prevalence of reason and rationale over distortion and misinformation undertaken by the negative forces in our region. I am confident that this Conference is a right step in that direction.

I convey my best wishes for the success of this conference. I hope that the participants can make concrete suggestions which could be examined and acted upon by the Governments of India and South and Central Asian countries, as well as by their corporate sectors.

Thank you.

022. Keynote Address by the External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the India Today Conclave on the theme of 'Government: Is it a hindrance or facilitator of change'.

New Delhi, March 6, 2009.

Mr. Chairperson,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am very pleased to be here at the 2009 India Today Conclave with such a distinguished audience. Over the years, the India Today Conclaves, bring together a diverse range of public figures, business persons and policy makers for discussions on the critical issues of the day.

The theme of the 2009 India Today Conclave, 'Challenges of Change', has been wisely chosen. To my mind, change is a multi-dimensional concept. Some aspects of change can be measured by indices like growth rates, per capita income, human development index etc; and the others which relate to the ethos and psyche of a nation and its cultural heritage cannot be quantified in exact terms but affect the way change is initiated and assimilated. We also have to recognize the cyclical nature of change from initiation to management to assimilation and back to initiation. There is always resistance to change because we all suffer from 'neophobia' to some extent and yet, for the development and growth of a nation or for that matter any organization, "change" is essential and its permanence has to be accepted.

Political scientists and philosophers alike have reflected on the processes, the dynamics and the meaning of change. And the focus of their enquiry - as indeed of the distinguished participants of this conclave - necessarily revolves around the management of change. Mainstream discourse, as opposed to revolutionary literature, must view change in evolutionary terms. Change should not be sudden and cataclysmic resulting in disruption in society but should lead to its sublimation.

Friends,

The current phase of globalization has shrunk the world and made boundaries between countries irrelevant. At one level, it has reduced us to a single entity, such that developments in one part of this global entity have implications on the other part, and often pronounced one at that.

The process of change is not linear, nor are the outcomes, and there are always concerns, uncertainties and choices to be exercised from competing alternatives and objectives. The process is indeed challenging. This could not have been better demonstrated than by the unfolding of the on-going global financial crisis. We are suddenly faced with the pitfalls of an unquestioning dependence on the functioning of liberal markets to sustain and enhance human well-being. Yet we have also seen how these very markets have been the means to bring unprecedented prosperity to a large part of the World over an extended period of time. They have opened up real possibilities for many of us in the developing World to make genuine progress in addressing some of our persistent problems of poverty, livelihood, health, education and security.

In my speech I have been asked to address a part of this larger issue - the question whether the government is a hindrance or facilitator of change. For me it is not easy to answer. As a person who has spent a better part of his life in public service and in the government, I would like to believe that the government is, more often, a facilitator and, at times, a regulator of change. Indeed it should be so in any democratic society.

Who could have imagined, even a few months ago, that Western governments would be nationalizing banks as they find themselves facing stark choices in the midst of deepening uncertainties? The public in the West cannot reconcile itself to the fact that the Governments, which swear by free market principles, are today unlearning the meaning of the expression 'free market'.

Friends,

Let me now turn to the factors that make a Government a facilitator of change. The three main factors in my view are: leadership, vision and expertise. History tells us that all momentous changes in the world have come from exercise of decisive leadership by individuals who have been associated with the State or have led governments in their societies. These have also been individuals who have either seized the opportunity to usher in change or have enjoyed broad based mandate to undertake change. I would identify the role played by Mr. Rajiv Gandhi who enjoyed a massive mandate to prepare the country for the 21st Century and with his leadership and vision helped India emerge as an IT powerhouse within a span of a decade or so. Invariably vision goes hand in hand with good leadership. Unless there is a coherent vision, the process of change may not bring the rewards that it seeks for the society and its people. More importantly, availability of expertise and knowledge is vital for guiding the process of change towards the desired social goal. There are many instances in history where the process of change and reforms that were underway failed to deliver the expected results or had to be shelved for want of expertise to guide the process.

Friends,

Permit me to take the liberty of introducing a personal note. I was born in pre-independence India. I have witnessed at close quarters the ravages of economic exploitation resulting from colonialism. In 1947, India was a poor, under-developed, agrarian society steeped in gross poverty, near total illiteracy, stark social inequality with very little infrastructure. The colonized Indian economy was characterized, according to historians, by four features. First, the integration of India's economy with the world economy in a subservient position. Second, a peculiar structure of production and international division of labour based on subservient nature of economic relationship with UK. Third, the small size of net savings (2.75% of GNP) and finally, unproductive consumption of social surplus/savings by the state and intermediaries. There was overwhelming support for the government taking a lead in creating the economic framework of a modern state which it did with great success and with results evident to every one at home and abroad.

This transformation, for which the foundation was laid by Mahatma Gandhi through his mass mobilization of people and the creation of an alternate vision of our future, could not have been achieved without the government of independent India implementing a comprehensive and vigorous agenda of change. The leaders of modern India did not sweep away the colonial administrative structure but infused it with a new spirit of purpose and direction reflecting the symbiotic spirit between the government and the broader community referred to earlier in my speech. The management of change and societal transformation in a peaceful, cohesive manner helped our young country survive the communal holocaust, partition and administrative meltdown. Thanks to the strong democratic institutional framework, which was created in that process, India has successfully managed change within the country and faced challenges from external sources. This enlightened audience will remember very well the early anxieties amongst our business community about economic liberalization. There was certainly a basis for these anxieties as evident from the example of several countries which could not withstand the resurgent tide of globalization following the end of the cold war.

This has been possible because India is, today, less socio-economically unequal than many of the western developed countries, as reflected in the Gini co-efficient, an index used by the World Bank to measure it. A high rate of growth and developed institutional and physical infrastructure prepares a vast and diverse society like ours better, than other countries, to face the current financial crisis, even though we should remain alert to its future course. Not wearing ideological goggles - of whatever colour - India does not suffer any lack of self-confidence in this crisis but feels that it can turn it into an opportunity. With an investment rate which has until recently been close to 40%, and a savings rate close to 38% of the GDP, I feel that India can face external factors with reasonable confidence.

Friends,

The current crisis is increasingly being recognized as the result of a flaw in the ideology and model of growth, which were considered sacrosanct. This failure in the West is of such a magnitude that governments cannot wish away their own responsibility. With a crisis in the financial sector, the role of the governments in the developed countries and elsewhere will only increase.

Government intervention should be to re-orient the direction and the complexion of economic growth. My broad prescription would be to make it more inclusive. This calls for a shift in paradigm at the national and international levels.

Friends,

Let me now turn to the current context in India and make a brief assessment of the role of government in India. The Government has to play the role of initiator, regulator and facilitator of change in varying degrees depending upon the internal and external environment. If I look at our post-independence experience, I am of the view that for most part of this period the government, by and large, did well in terms of managing the process of change in the society and the economy, given our initial conditions and the context. A good indicator for that is the roots that democratic institutions have taken in the country and the unity of our nation, amidst the vast social, cultural, economic and ethnic diversity of our people. There have been shortfalls in some areas and perhaps some measures by the government may not have been timely, but we have moved ahead.

Now, when we are at the threshold of a promising period, when change is more visible than ever before in all aspects of our lives, the performance of government is also being viewed with new benchmarks. The expectations from the government are much higher and rightfully so.

With many sectors of the Indian economy becoming globally competitive, the contrast in performance between the corporate and government sectors and between the State Governments in India and the State/provincial governments in other fast-growing economies such as China is becoming more visible. As substantial resources, both public and private, are being mobilised to fuel the growth of the economy and make it more inclusive in character, there is a legitimate concern that every bit of the public effort should count and yield better results.

In a broad sense, governance can be broken into two levels. At an aggregative level, the purpose of governance is to provide an environment that supports and encourages private initiative in a non-discriminatory and inclusive manner. It is concerned, for instance, with laws governing markets, protection of constitutional rights and systems guaranteeing territorial integrity. At an individual level, it is concerned with provision of basic services universally to all citizens with a view to build individual capabilities to harness opportunities. The fact that these services must be provided universally often translates into a much greater government involvement as they may not be easily managed and incentivized through the market mechanism. Initiatives such as the NREGS, Bharat Nirman and the Right to Information Act have to be viewed in this light. Notwithstanding the criticism directed at the implementation gaps that these initiatives suffer from - and all of them have great scope for improvement - doing away with them or transferring their implementation to market mechanisms are not responsible alternatives, at least not at the current juncture of India's development.

For these programmes to be successful, it is necessary that ground level implementation is efficient. For this, local authorities have to play a very large role; indeed, the efficiency of these programmes is completely determined by the activities of the "last mile". The Central Government can do two things - conceptualize the programmes and commit resources, both of which they have already done. In addition to this, given that the implementation is with the local authorities, the Central Government can play an additional role, viz., that of ensuring that local authorities have enough incentives to implement the programmes.

The enactment of the Right to Information Act at the Centre and in many States has bridged a critical gap in the public decision-making process, ushering in greater accountability of the public servants. This move towards greater transparency and right to access public information has been greatly aided by developments in information technology and e-governance.

Friends,

At the international level too, we need to re-orient the growth paradigm to be followed by the international institutions and the donor countries. It is all the more critical because the developing countries still have positive growth rates and can provide the basis for global economic recovery. A well directed aid and trade effort can help in generating domestic economic demand and green growth.

In these difficult times, it will be short-sighted to go into protectionist mode. In fact, this was the key message of the Washington Summit of G20 countries on 15 November, 2008. I quote, "we underscore the critical importance of rejecting protectionism and not turning inward in times of financial uncertainty". That the biggest economy in the world, the United States, where this global financial Tsunami originated, should be resorting to trade-restrictive practices is particularly disturbing. The US Government's stimulus package imposing restrictions on public procurement or discouraging US firms from outsourcing or restricting hiring of foreign workers is not in keeping with the spirit of global cooperation. It also runs counter to the current efforts to stem the sharp decline in economic growth world wide, especially in the US and other developed markets. This is a negative trend and is likely to have a cascading effect in other major economies and, thereby, undermine the global efforts to overcome the current crisis in the shortest possible time-frame.

Friends,

Of the many challenges of change today, which the governments have to manage, one of the most important is terrorism. The world at large is slowly but surely moving in the direction of reaching the threshold of zero tolerance of terrorism. States that have used terror as an instrument of state policy should be left with no choice but to dismantle their infrastructure of terrorism and actively cooperate with the international community to eliminate this scourge.

As this week's reprehensible attack on Sri Lankan cricketers in Lahore shows, government's lack of will or capability in tackling this menace becomes a major hindrance in the smooth process of change. This threat needs the efforts of the international community at large to ensure that it is eliminated on an urgent basis. Otherwise, no part of the world would remain immune to the flames being ignited there. These developments are most disturbing for every right thinking person in the world and, without doubt, for us Indians.

It stands to reason that the Government's ability to manage and facilitate change in the interest of its people is possible only when the Government itself is responsive to its citizens' aspirations. The manipulation of popular opinion through spin or by the undermining of the institutions crucial role for democratic functioning can only result in short-term gains and long-term failures.

In conclusion, I could do no better but to state that India's own historical experience as a modern nation demonstrates that the government has played a critical and pivotal role in the management of change. This has been possible, also, due to the nature of relationship which has been established between the civil society and the government. A responsive government has defined its role - interventionist or non-interventionist - as required at different times in our independent history. Today as we move ahead on a high growth rate trajectory, I can confidently say that we are sure about the efficacy of the Indian model of economic growth: unique in world history. Our socially equitable economic growth has taken place within a democratic framework which was used not only for wealth creation, but also for wealth distribution. The concern for "Aam Admi" is central to this philosophy of inclusive growth.

Thank you.

023. Address by Secretary (ER) Hardip Singh Puri in the Ministry of External Affairs on "Ensuring India's Energy Security: Domestic Measures and External Approaches".

New Delhi, March 9, 2009.

Dr. Bhartia

Dr. Parekh,

Mr. Banerjee

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Thank you for inviting me to address the National Conference on "Ensuring India's Energy Security: Domestic Measures and External Policy Approaches." It stands to reason that when there is a Guest of Honour, it should not be necessary for others to address the same session. But, since I am here, let me say a few words.

2. Twenty First century global realities have altered the concept of national security. While national security is a holistic concept, energy security is one of its major components. The latter essentially involves ensuring uninterrupted supply of energy to support the economic and commercial activities necessary for sustained economic growth.

3. Energy consumption is both a necessary condition for economic growth and a consequence of it. Need of the hour, therefore, is to acknowledge the important challenges to India's energy security, which are both internal and external in nature. Internally, India has a limited resource base and lacks adequate infrastructure. The external challenge lies in getting a continuous supply of energy at reasonable prices as domestic production is low but the demand is high.

4. In a 2004 report, the International Energy Agency (IEA) estimated that by 2030 the world would be consuming around 121 million barrels per day and, to achieve this, the global oil industry requires an investment of approximately $3 trillion. In a 2006 report, the agency revised the estimated investment volume upwards to $4.3 trillion to produce a little less quantum of oil, 116 million barrels per day, by 2030. This rise of 43% in investment volume to produce 5 million barrels less per day for the same period has been attributed to the end of 'cheap oil era'. This in turn is a result of the ageing existing "giant and super giant" oil fields as well as the need to drill for oil in new and small sized wells, whose marginal cost would be much higher than that of existing giant and super giant fields.

5. The recent drop in crude oil prices from a peak of US $147 a barrel to below $40 has evidently provided relief to oil importing countries such as India, which have been triply inflicted by huge oil pool deficits, growing food prices and global economic downturn. But based on current oil market fundamentals and past experience, there is no reason to believe that the current fall in oil prices is indicative of any future trend. Sooner or later prices will rise.

6. According to the Integrated Energy Policy India needs to sustain an economic growth rate of 8-10% over the next 25 years, in order to eradicate poverty and meet its human development needs. This would require augmentation of primary energy supplies by 4-5 times by 2030-31. At present, India consumes approximately 3.1 million barrels of oil a day and this is expected to grow to a couple of million barrels more, making India the third largest consuming country in Asia and the fourth largest in the world. Expenditure-wise, year-on-year basis, a rise in the price of oil by a single dollar costs the economy approximately Rs.17.7 million. Besides, it would trigger oil-induced cascading effects, including inflation, unemployment, and social unrest.

7. India aspires to a medium-to-long term strategy of implementing a strategic shift from fossil fuels to non-fossil fuels, from non-renewable to renewable sources of energy, and from conventional to non-conventional sources of energy. Our energy mix currently is 51% based on coal, 36% on oil, 9% on natural gas and only 2% from hydropower and nuclear energy respectively. It is estimated that by 2030-31, we would have to import 66% of our coal, 90% of our oil and 60% of our natural gas. Presently, we depend to the extent of 70% on imported oil which makes us vulnerable to external shocks.

8. Ensuring continuous availability of commercial energy at competitive prices to support economic growth and meet our energy needs with safe, clean and convenient forms of energy is vital for the continued growth of the economy. We need to adopt a multi-pronged and coordinated energy strategy which requires: increasing the domestic supply of crude oil and gas by fast-tracking upstream activities; substituting oil consumption by gas and clean coal (keeping in view the relative energy yields in dollar terms of various fuel options); increasing reliance on renewable sources of energy such as nuclear energy, solar energy, wind energy and bio-fuels; increasing our own hydro-electricity production and developing mutually beneficial models to tap the hydro-electricity potential in neighboring countries; improving energy efficiency; diversifying our supply sources and acquiring energy assets abroad.

9. Let me elaborate on some of the key elements of our energy security today:

- i. The Government has been trying to increase domestic exploration and production with efforts aimed at encouraging investment in the exploration of hydrocarbons, development of fields and production and marketing, strengthening of National Oil Companies and improved recovery of domestic hydrocarbon resources.
- ii. Diversification of sources of oil and gas supply is the key to the promotion of our energy security. While maintaining our traditional supply lines from the Middle East, we must augment our energy supplies from countries in Africa, Latin America and South-East Asia. In 2007-08, India actually sourced nearly 18% of its oil from Africa. We are also seriously looking at the CIS region for oil, natural gas, hydropower and uranium resources. Latin America is another attractive energy supply source for India. In South Asia, a network of gas pipelines and power grids will enhance energy security in the region, essentially of India, and also significantly benefit its smaller neighbors, reduce cost of fuel transportation and help in an optimal and efficient harnessing of energy resources.
- iii. Obtaining equity oil and gas abroad would also help in augmenting our energy reserves. Since the early 1980s, Indian oil companies both public and private have been investing in overseas oil and gas projects, with activities covering 20 countries today. OVL's total equity oil production is currently around 9 million tones a year.
- iv. Creation of a Strategic Petroleum Reserve (SPR), though expensive to create and maintain, would reduce the country's vulnerability to short-term oil shocks and soothe price fluctuations. Apart from the creation of SPR, co-operation with other Asian countries, which maintain strategic reserves, is required. For instance, mutually beneficial co-operation with Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Singapore is possible in areas such as joint identification and storage of reserves at low-cost locations, co-coordinated response to global and regional energy crisis and short-term lending and borrowing facility in the event of temporary shortage.

- v. India has promising potential of renewables, nuclear energy and non-conventional hydrocarbon resources such as Gas Hydrates and Shale Oil. Exploitation of these resources would require development of appropriate technologies through indigenous R&D, involvement of global energy majors and creation of a sound regulatory and policy framework to encourage investment in these sources of energy.
  - vi. On the renewable energy front, India has a strong manufacturing and R&D orientation and is emerging as a hub of wind, solar, biomass related manufacturing and exports. Over 11,200 MW of renewable based capacity has already been installed. Numerous fiscal and financial incentives are being given for the promotion and exploitation of renewable energy.
  - vii. Nuclear energy is another potential source to ensure India's energy security in the medium and long term. Nuclear power development is essential not only in the context of energy security but also in terms of its environmental advantages. With the Indo-US nuclear cooperation agreement we can hope to secure the required supplies of nuclear fuel for enhancing our nuclear power generation.
  - viii. Improving energy efficiency through technology and innovative approaches constitutes an important aspect of our multi-pronged strategy. Increasing energy efficiency can lead to reducing energy requirement for the same level of economic output.
10. As part of its growing emphasis on energy security, a new Energy Security Division has been created in the MEA to facilitate our multifaceted global engagement in pursuit of India's interests in the energy sector.
11. I believe that the current economic downturn provides both oil producing countries and oil consuming countries a perfect opportunity to enhance cooperation on mutually agreed terms and conditions and enter into long-term contracts. Oil exporting countries faced with falling revenues are anxious to manage the volatility of oil markets and stabilize their oil incomes. According to the International Monetary Fund, a decline of $1 in the price of crude would translate into a loss in revenues of $3.5 billion for Saudi Arabia, $300 million for Qatar, $1 billion for the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and $960 million for Kuwait. The recent drop in demand has drastically reduced prices leading oil refineries to build up huge stocks, both stable and mobile. According to the Wall Street Journal, oil supplies are now building at such a rate that over 40 million barrels are being held in idle supertankers around the world. Thus, it is obvious that the present situation is opportune for both oil producing and consuming countries to enter into 'contracts' to hedge their losses from unforeseen shocks and spikes.

12. Ladies and Gentlemen, as we grow as a nation, our energy needs are bound to grow concurrently. With depleting reserves, energy security takes on a serious connotation. If we are to meet India's overall growth objectives, ensuring energy security of the country is of critical importance. It is imperative that all stakeholders strive towards reducing our dependence on fossil fuels in the medium to long term by increasing the share of renewables in our overall energy mix. The challenge before us is to augment our domestic supplies while consolidating and diversifying our external resources so as to achieve a more rational and sustainable energy matrix over the next 10-15 years. We strongly support efforts to develop a cooperative framework through intensive consumer-producer dialogue, transparent exchange of data and information and cooperation in R&D in conventional and non-conventional energy resources. The current slump will not in any way dampen India's investment thrust in the field of energy. The need of the hour is to plan ahead and secure the future of our younger generation.

13. Before I conclude, let me respond positively and enthusiastically to the suggestion made by Mr. Bhartia to establish an Energy Think Tank funded jointly by the Government and the public and private sector. This is a suggestion that has been made earlier and I can confirm that the Ministry of External Affairs would be happy to look at such a proposal.

14. I would like to congratulate CII for taking the initiative in organizing this Conference and inviting experts from various fields to discuss an important topic as Energy Security.

024. Interview of Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon with Kalyani Shankar for the All India Radio.

New Delhi, March 19, 2009.

KS: Mr. Menon you had extensive talks with the US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on various things.

FS: Now this time when I met her she showed great familiarity with all the details of the relationship and also a great willingness to carry this forward. That it was high of her when she spoke of the stand alone strategic partnership between India and the US and in building on that partnership she also said that she wished to take the relationship to a new level. She is looking forward to visiting India.

KS: Mr. Menon what about the Mumbai terror attack?

FS: I discussed that certainly. I informed US friends. This is an issue. Since the attack came from Pakistan we had made it clear from the beginning that we would like to see two outcomes. One is the perpetrators are brought to justice and secondly that Pakistan take credible steps to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism in Pakistan which has led to these attacks and to other attacks as well in India and elsewhere in the world. Pakistan has taken the first step towards the first goal. In other words, she has arrested some people, undertaken some investigations and she had then shared with us some of the results of that investigation. The US has its own legal responsibilities and we have associated the FBI with the investigation and given them access and so on. So they also informed us what they will do

I think it is clear. This sort of terrorism out of Pakistan is a global menace. It is not only a threat to India or a threat only to the US, threat to the entire globe. So we also discussed what we could be doing in terms of international action, whether in terms of listing more entities and individuals in the UN Security Council's list of terrorist organizations and their supporters, like we listed Jammah-ud-Dawah last December, or whether the comprehensive convention on international terrorism, whether we can make progress on that in the UN. We discussed those kinds of steps also. So I think the determination is very strong on both sides to see that we carry this through so that we can ultimately hope to eliminate the scourge. Both the Americans and we have said that is the first step in the right direction, but there is more to be done. And I think the Americans have said this also in public.

KS: Mrs. Clinton wanted more cooperation in bilateral and global issues. Was there anything specific in this regard ?

FS: Well, we went though. In fact she showed great knowledge all the specific aspects in which we are cooperating and on what we could be doing. We agreed. Say, in education that we need to increase the exchanges in each of these areas. She was very knowledgeable about what we have done, on climate change and energy security and on the thing we could do. We also discussed some regional issues. She mentioned Sri Lanka and the situation of civilians in Sri Lanka and what we could do. I told her yes we would do whatever could. We have set up a hospital now in Sri Lanka to care of the internally displaced persons and civilians who come out of the conflict zone and how we would try and work together. Also for the rehabilitation of the areas so that normal democratic life can return as soon as possible for the Tamil civilian population in northern Sri Lanka. I think that is very important because after 23 years of civil war this is a society which has been traumatized- all size and all communities. And we really need to bring them back to normalcy in some way. And that is how we can do that. I told her about that. So in a sense we discussed regional issue, we discussed bilateral relations, how to carry it forward and also larger global issues, we mentioned on proliferation, we mentioned climate change, we mentioned energy security. So we covered quite a few issues.

KS: Mr. Menon, Obama's when special envoy Richard Halbrooke, when he came here and met you and you also met him there and he sought you views on how to deal with Afghanistan.

FS: Our experience is that what you really need is to do an integrated strategy, where you provide security and where in the secure areas we must be able to do development with the communities themselves. Some of our most successful projects in Afghanistan, we do the big ones, the infrastructure, the roads, power transmissions and so on. If we can integrate both security and the development part of it, then I think we would be making progress in Afghanistan. First one is to build this secure, development area and that actually is very important. That Pakistan decides stop using these elements as instruments of state policy abroad, in Afghanistan or in India. All these extremists group and that is crucial.

KS: Mr. Menon in your meeting with the US National Security Advisor, Gen. James Jones, was there any discussion about how to take forward the Indo-US nuclear deal?

FS: I think, in a sense that is the point we have been making, that will be an integrated development strategy and a security strategy, a military strategy which ensures peace within which you can do the development, that is true for Afghanistan. On the civil nuclear side not only with Gen. Jones but with the others also. We are happy at the progress we are making. We have now done the additional protocol with the IAEA for the safeguards, we are working with the US side, directly to see that we can start talking with the US companies. We are separately doing our internal processes for civil nuclear liabilities so that, you know, US companies are able to operate in India. We will take this forward to commercialization. Separately, now that we have done the civil nuclear initiative we think it is possible now to move on to larger and bigger things and to work together to eliminate many of the restrictions, technology and other restrictions that applied to India from the past. So we will start that exercise together with US.

KS: You also went to Pentagon and did you have discussions about the military cooperation?

FS: We had a little bit on the military-to-military cooperation, the Star talks and so on which are very useful to both sides. We did that also. We reviewed that cooperation. We also had an exchange, of course, some regional situation, as part of the strategic review that US is doing. One is the part of that was done by Gen Petraeus, who was there in the meeting.

KS: You were talking about Pakistan and there is much instability there with the United States also concerned because they are putting pressure on President Zardari?

FS: We want and we made this clear for several years in our behaviour in what we say and in action. We really require and what we need for our own interest is a stable, peaceful Pakistan. US shares this goal. For obviously the internal affairs of Pakistan, it is for the Pakistan to settle. It is not for us to prescribe how we, as democrats think this is the best system and we would hope to see that democracy in Pakistan is strengthened. We will work with all those in Pakistan who are ready to work for better India-Pakistan relations. We will not interfere in their internal affairs.

KS: Mr. Menon, Prime Minister is going to London for the G-20 meeting. What is going to be the agenda? What kind of economic issues will come up?

FS: Well, the core agenda is to restore financial system, the global financial system to help and to overcome the global economic crisis. Because there is a crisis in the real economy in the world, which is in recession actually and by most measures and to try and overcome that to restore growth. We, in India, are relatively lucky but frankly we also have been affected, our export markets are affected and our economy could be growing faster but want for the global situation. Essentially, our Prime Minister will be addressing both these questions. These questions naturally lead to questions of global economy, governance of global economy, monitoring and regulation are also to the kinds of stimulus that is required and the kinds of financial structures that you need to try and fix what happens so that it never happens again and that we can restore the economy to growth. The global economy is actually coming of its most extended period of growth ever historically. It has never actually done as well before this. But the idea is to get it back on track. So the first task really is to do that in London and to fix the structures so that this kind of thing does not happen again. In some sense, the institutions were working which no longer reflect the current realities. So, we need to bring them in line with current realities. So that is a big agenda. And let us see, the preparation so far going well. You would have seen in G-20 finance ministers' statement. But there is much more work to be done before April 22nd when the G-20 leaders meet in London.

KS: Do you have any special...?

FS: Well, we will work across the board on all these issues to try and increase the international economic system capability, both to overcome the recession and also to deal with the financial crisis.

KS: In your talks with the Mrs. Clinton, did you bring this question of protectionism?

FS: I mentioned it not only in the State Department but also with many other Senators and Congressmen because it is a matter which really concerns us. Frankly, the world in the 1930s, during depression turned to protectionism and we don't think protectionism is the answer even though it might be attractive to some leaders, some economies. So we in fact raised it across the board and I was heartened to see that most people understood that protectionism is no solution. And if anything makes a solution harder but we will have to see how this develops. It is one of the issues that will come up at the G-20 leaders meeting as well.

KS: Is our Prime Minister going to meet Obama for the first time, I mean, since President Obama has taken charge?

FS: It is likely. We are still we are working on that schedule. One of the big issues will be the economy, will be our bilateral relationship, all the things that we are doing and that we hope to do together.

KS: Visas?

FS: Frankly, Visas are a matter of sovereign right. But we do feel that the free movement of people those who have trade must be allowed because it permits trade and economic cooperation. And unless these things are open, it becomes much harder for services, for various, which is why they are part of the WTO negotiations, are also part of the discussions between States. But ultimately, the issue of Visas for any country is a matter of its sovereign decision. But it will balance out the considerations and it will see how it works.

KS: Is the PM likely to talk about outsourcing also?

FS: As of now these are all issue still need to be seen through. There are many fears, I think, that protectionism is rising that something is happening. But I think we still need to see how we deal with these issues, whatever actually does. More important is that everybody must be convinced that protectionism doesn't work. And, in fact, it is a wrong way to go. That is more important.

KS: Thank you very much.

025. Press interaction of External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna on assumption of office.

New Delhi, May 23, 2009.

I am deeply honoured to assume charge of the high office of the Minister of External Affairs. We are at a moment in history when the world situation is rapidly changing and India, as a responsible power, must engage actively with the world. I am deeply conscious of the opportunities available to us and the difficulties that we face as we continue to pursue our independent foreign policy of peace and development, and strengthen our strategic autonomy.

2. In the coming years under the stewardship of PM Shri Manmohan Singh, it will be my endeavour to further advance our interest in the international arena. Our primary objective is to sustain high rates of economic growth in the range of 9 to 10% during the coming decades. For that, we require peace and tranquility in our extended neighbourhood and a supportive international environment.

3. I accord highest priority to strengthen our political, economic and cultural relations with our neighbours and look forward to visiting them soon.

4. To strengthen our policy and developmental options we will consolidate further our existing strategic partnership with major powers like USA, Russia, China, Japan and EU. Our strong and traditional ties with countries in Africa, West Asia and Latin America will be furthered and our Look East Policy strengthened.

I look forward to these challenging task in the pursuit of India's non-aligned foreign policy.

Thank you.

Question: Since the Sri Lankan claims that the ethnic war is over in Northern Sri Lanka, now India has a most significant role to play to protect the rights and create basic infrastructure for the affected people. What kind of plan the Government of India is having in addition to providing regular relief material?

EAM: India will work with the people and Government of Sri Lanka to provide relief to those effected by the tragic conflict, as also to rapidly rehabilitate all those who have been displaced in order to bring their lives to normalcy as soon as possible.

With the conventional conflict in Sri Lanka coming to an end, this is the moment when the root causes of conflict in Sri Lanka can be addressed. This would include political steps towards the effective devolution of power within the Sri Lankan Constitution so that Sri Lankans of all communities, including the Tamils, can feel at home and lead lives of dignity of their own free will.

Question: This is on Pakistan. Do you think it is a good time for India to pull back troops from the border? What do you think about America increasing aid for Pakistan without making it conditional on stopping cross border terrorism against India?

EAM: We can change our friends, but not our neighbours. In general, we desire to live with all our neighbours in peace and to create a tension free situation with all our neighbours. We stand ready to extend our hand of partnership to Pakistan, if they take determined and credible action to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism operating from there territory.

026. Address of Admiral Suresh Mehta, Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff Committee and Chief of Naval Staff at the 8th Shangri La Dialogue organised by the International Institute of Strategic Studies on the theme: The Major Powers and Asian Security: Cooperation or Conflict?

Singapore, May 30, 2009.

Dr John Chipman,

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen,

It is indeed a singular privilege to be able to share a few thoughts with you at the eighth IISS Asia Summit. I would like to thank the organisers, the state of Singapore and the IISS for this opportunity.

Let me start by stating that change is upon us in many parts of the world, but perhaps nowhere more so than in the oceanic expanses and the littoral regions of the Indian and Pacific Oceans. This changed security environment is characterised by two apparently opposite strains: on the one hand, the individual security strategy of each individual nation is increasingly enmeshed with that of the collective – a theme that has been spoken about this morning, and also last evening; on the other hand, the quest for human security is coming into sharper focus. As such, the term 'security' has now assumed increasingly dominant political, economic, societal and environmental dimensions. It jostles for space with the traditional military one and, yet, the two strains are linked, since human security transcends both national borders and the Westphalian constructs of sovereignty.

As a consequence of these changes we stand today at a fork in our journey through space and time. One path leads to cooperation and the other to conflict. As these paths meander along, they often run very close abreast and sometimes even overlap. These proximities and overlaps bring many questions in their wake. For instance, how can economic competition for finite resources in geographically coincident areas be prevented from transforming itself into conflict? What degree of relevance should we attach to a historical review of Japan in the period leading up to the Second World War, vis-à-vis the present day competition for energy and minerals by major powers within the Indian and the Pacific littoral? Does economic interdependence increase or decrease the probability of armed conflict? The liberal school argues that it does, because nations would rather trade than invade and, yet, the realist school dismisses this theory by highlighting historical evidence of the First World War when major European powers, particularly Great Britain and Germany, had reached unprecedented levels of interdependence and, yet, went to war. Which is truer of our regions and our times? Is the form of government necessarily an indicator of the external behaviour of a nation? These are some of the questions that confront us, the answers to which will determine our future.

As I said a little while ago, the individual security strategy of each nation is today increasingly enmeshed with that of the collective. It is here that the role of major powers assumes importance. Firstly, let me broach yet another facet of change by suggesting that the expression 'major power' is no longer limited to a single nation state entity alone. The Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) is a prime example of a major power of the newer kind, as is the European Union. In some cases, major military blocs such as NATO have either already taken over roles and functions that would characteristically be performed by individual nation states or show a marked tendency to do so.

Today, we have come to live in an era characterised by the rise of insidious and malignant forces that have redefined security responses the world over. Here, I refer to the rise of the malevolent non state actor. Even more ominously, the occasional coursing of the state with the malevolent non state entities has created an evil hybrid that we might describe as 'state sponsored non state actor'. It is this hybrid that lies at the heart of our current security dilemma, which, for India, has been made all the more pressing by the tragic events in Mumbai in November 2008.

Should our preventive, curative and punitive security efforts be directed principally towards the state sponsor or the non state entity? How are the linkages between the two to be laid bare for the world to see? These changes are altering the geo strategies of our aid in a fundamental manner.

Can a contextually specific case therefore be made out, whereby cooperation among nation states is used to combat malevolent non state entities, terrorists and pirates? What then should be the legitimate and most responsible role that major state powers should play? What organisational constructs would be the most apt for such a goal to be realised?

Perhaps the foremost issue for any organisational construct that seeks to address the demands of such a holistic security paradigm is acceptability. I do believe that region specific acceptability is a sine qua non for any meaningful progress towards cooperation. The cultural and societal context of Asia is very different from that of, say, the Americas or Europe. Cultural sensitivities in Asia must be acknowledged, understood and respected. This is a complex business because Asia is heterogeneous in the extreme. Newer powers, often imbued with both the exuberant energy and the impatience of youth, need to resist the temptation of simply extrapolating what works for them upon the entirely different civilisational paradigm of Asia. Regional issues are best tackled by regional sensitivity. This is precisely why we look upon regionally focused structures, such as the Western Pacific Naval Symposium (WPNS) or the Indian Ocean Naval Symposium (IONS), with so much hope and expectation, even though they are basically navy specific constructs.

Having said that, I must emphasise that for any security construct in Asia to succeed its architecture must be evolved in a manner that reduces friction and reassures smaller states of their rightful place within such a construct, without prejudice to size, economic stature or any other consideration. The onus for this clearly lies with the larger economically stable and militarily stronger states of the region. Regional and extra regional powers, whether established or emerging, of course have a crucial role to play. No cooperative, consultative or constructive endeavour can succeed in the face of opposition from major state powers, yet no meaningful conflict can be waged against malignant non state powers without state powers joining hands in cooperative endeavour. For major state powers, there is actually no choice but to support and participate in cooperative, consultative and constructive endeavours to defeat such forces. I might quote here Martin Luther King Jr, who once said, 'We may all have come on different ships, but we are in the same boat now.'

Asia today is witnessing the historical and simultaneous rise of at least four major powers, namely China, Japan, India and the 10 countries of ASEAN.

These Asian powers are witnessing unprecedented economic activity and, even in these recessionary times, the economic performance of India, China and Indonesia is indeed impressive. On the other hand, Asia is also the crucible from which many of the world's most obscurantist and malevolent forces are taking frightening form and substance. The challenge, therefore, is to keep the engines of growth running through trade, commerce and every other form of human endeavour, while at the same time keeping disruptive forces at bay.

This is no mean challenge and no country, however large or powerful, has the wherewithal to insulate itself from the omnipresent threats of which terrorism is the newest and most grotesque manifestation. Other universal concerns that nation states face today include: threats from nefarious traffickers of drugs, arms and human beings; organised poachers; ships that clandestinely discharge oil and toxic cargo into the sea or onto the shores of unsuspecting and ill informed states; mercenaries; and modern day pirates. There are also non traditional security threats encompassing a wide range of potential crises, including environmental degradation, infectious diseases and illegal migration. While these challenges are not within the purview of the more traditional military concerns, they may nonetheless pose a challenge to national security and regional stability. Put together, they constitute a deadly cocktail that constitutes a common challenge that can only be faced through common resolve.

This will require many overlapping and interlocking structures, multiple opportunities and mechanisms for constructive engagement. It will need a transformation in the way we think and the way we look at one another. It will also require those nations that have the necessary resources and the wherewithal to pick up the burden of public good, in ensuring all forms of security to life, trade and property to ensure the wellbeing of the region.

Concerted efforts at capability enhancement and capacity building of the smaller countries of the region, through active assistance of larger neighbours, would be crucial to such efforts in the long term. Many of us – and that includes India – have some ongoing programmes in this direction, and they have also been referred to by Secretary Gates this morning, but I think we could do with some fillip over here.

India is indeed committed to building a secure environment, in which trade and economic development can proceed unhindered. We see the Indian Navy as a significant stabilising force in the Indian Ocean region, which safeguards traffic bound not only for our own ports, but also the flow of hydrocarbons and strategically important cargo to and from the rest of the world across the strategic waterways close to our shores. As Asian economies, including that of India, are expected to grow at higher than world averages in the decade to come, so will our vulnerabilities, which arise from the disruption of sea trade.

And so, the safety of SLOCS will always remain a priority for India in the foreseeable future. The Indian Navy has been a trendsetter in anti piracy efforts off the Gulf of Aden and, while there has been a reduction in piracy incidents, much remains to be done to optimise global efforts in that fragile region.

Benign operations comprise one of the cornerstones of India's reasonable engagement. The tsunami relief operations of 2004, the non combatant evacuation operations from Lebanon in 2006 and the more recent responses to cyclones Nargis and Sidr, which struck Myanmar and Bangladesh respectively, as well as medical relief to Sri Lanka in the wake of the recently unfolded humanitarian crisis, are examples of our commitment to our neighbours and the safety of our diaspora.

We have also been mindful of the need to assist our smaller neighbours to help themselves. Our capability enhancement and capacity building initiatives with Sri Lanka, Seychelles, Maldives and Mauritius have adequately enabled them to deal with many of their security concerns on their own. I am convinced that, as India grows in economic and military stature, it would have to take upon itself the role of further equipping its neighbours in ways that would not only enhance their own security but contribute positively to regional stability as well. On the navy to navy level, IONS [Indian Ocean Naval Symposium], which was launched in February last year, is a significant military construct to bring together regional navies aimed at addressing common concerns. We hope that, in the due course of time, this will shake hands with other such constructs across into the other oceans.

Let me conclude therefore by stating, quite emphatically, that my vote, whether for cooperation or conflict, would go definitely for the former. The future of this planet hinges on how Asia conducts itself in world affairs in the next few decades. Our rise to eminence or fading away to insignificance would depend on whether we choose to cooperate or confront each other. I firmly believe that there is room for everyone to grow without being confrontationalist in our approaches. On this note, let me end with the words of Benjamin Franklin: 'If we do not hang together, we will hang separately.'

Thank you for your attention.

Answering questions about terrorism during the Question-Answer session Admiral Mehta said:

There were two queries. The first was what gives us sleepless nights. The answer to that is fairly easy: in more recent times, it has been the rise of non state actors. The asymmetric threat that comes in front of armed forces bothers us most of all. The rise of phenomenal; it is across the board. Many countries are affected by it. I am sure they all have to face this threat head on, but it is a very difficult threat to face, because you are dealing with somebody who is either not visible, not seen too clearly, or the force that you wish to apply needs to be tempered somewhat. That bothers us most of all and goes on to the specific question that was asked to me; this one was asked of the whole panel.

The specific query pertained to the state sponsored terrorism I was referring to. Let me put it like this: there are of course disparate groups that enter into this kind of activity. There is no doubt about that. In the specific context you raised, the Mumbai attacks, one sees a certain amount of professionalism and precision, and a considerable amount of specific planning, which has gone into the manoeuvre that was undertaken. This certainly makes us believe there is covert support for such elements. Be that as it may, the end point would be that states from whose territory such acts emanate, be they from non state actors or state supported non state actors, themselves have a certain moral obligation to ensure that these kinds of acts are not permitted in their territories. To that extent, the countries concerned themselves need to take a certain kind of action to prevent these kinds of things from happening.

027. Extracts from the Speech of President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil while addressing the Joint Session of 15th Lok Sabha.

New Delhi, June 3, 2009.

"Honourable Members,

1. I am extremely happy to address the first session of both Houses of Parliament after the elections to the 15th Lok Sabha. My greetings to all members, especially the newly elected members of the Lok Sabha. They are here having spent the last few months in the scorching heat trying to persuade their voters on how they could best represent the aspirations of their electorate. They now have the mandate and the opportunity to translate the hopes and aspirations of the people of India into change in the everyday lives of the people. It is indeed a unique privilege given to a chosen few to represent the hopes of over a billion people, a sixth of humanity.

2. I am sure that their anxieties, hopes and dreams will weigh on you as you commence your work. I urge you to use each day of the next five years in giving substance to those aspirations and in doing so, find greater meaning in your own lives. My good wishes are with you.

9. My Government will maintain utmost vigil in the area of internal security. A policy of zero-tolerance towards terrorism, from whatever source it originates, will be pursued. Stern measures to handle insurgency and left wing extremism will be taken. Government has already prepared a detailed plan to address internal security challenges to be implemented in a time-bound manner. The Multi-Agency Centre will be strengthened to ensure effective intelligence sharing and processing and Subsidiary Multi-Agency Centres will be activated in all States. The National Investigation Agency has become operational and will be empowered to handle terror-related offences. Central and State police forces and intelligence agencies will be expanded and fully equipped with the best technology. A national counter-terrorism centre will be established to take pro-active anti-terrorism measures. Special Forces and Quick Response Teams will be raised and deployed in vulnerable areas. Enhanced information and intelligence sharing on a real time basis, would be made possible by the creation of a net-centric information command structure.

10. My Government will actively pursue police reform and in order to ensure the active participation of the citizenry in internal security, community policing will be promoted. At the same time government will continue to constructively engage with all groups that abjure violence in the Northeast, Jammu and Kashmir and other parts of the country.

12. Our armed forces are the nation's pride, a symbol of our values of sacrifice, valour and the spirit of national integration. India's defence forces stand committed to the task of defending the territorial integrity of the country. They will be fully enabled with modern technology to repel any threat from land, sea or air. To enhance combat efficiency as also to address the requirements of modern day warfare, a number of steps are under way. The welfare of ex-servicemen will continue to be accorded high priority. The Committee headed by the Cabinet Secretary, to look into the issue of One Rank One Pension has already commenced its work and expects to complete it by the end of June 2009.

40. My Government is proactively addressing issues of climate change through eight national missions. Of these the National Solar Mission, the National Water Mission, the National Mission on Energy Efficiency, the National Mission on Sustainable Agriculture and the National Mission on Sustainable Habitat will be launched by the end of this year. The National Ganga River Basin Authority, set up recently will evolve a new action plan for cleaning and beautifying the river in partnership with the basin states.

41. My Government's foreign policy will continue to pursue India's enlightened national interest, maintaining the strategic autonomy and independent decision-making that has been its hallmark. India has a vital interest in the stability and prosperity of our neighbours. The highest priority will be accorded to working with our friends in SAARC to promote stability, development and prosperity in the region. Government will sincerely work with our neighbours to ensure that outstanding issues are addressed and the full potential of our region is realized.

42. My Government will seek to reshape our relationship with Pakistan depending on the sincerity of Pakistan's actions to confront groups who launch terrorist attacks against India from its territory. We will support initiatives in Sri Lanka, which can lead to a permanent political solution of the conflict there and ensure that all Sri Lankan communities, especially the Tamils, feel secure and enjoy equal rights so that they can lead a life of dignity and self-respect. India will make appropriate contribution to rehabilitate those affected by the conflict. In Nepal and Bangladesh, where multi-party democracy has returned, India will work closely with both countries to continue expanding bilateral ties for mutual benefit. Government will strengthen our close and vibrant partnerships with Bhutan and Maldives and continue to assist in the reconstruction of Afghanistan.

43. The momentum of improvement of our relations with the major powers will be maintained. The transformation of our partnership with the United States of America will be taken forward. Our strategic partnership with Russia has grown over the years, and we will seek to further consolidate it. With countries of Europe and Japan my Government will continue the sustained diplomatic efforts, which have produced qualitative changes in our relations since 2004. The multi-faceted partnership with China will be expanded.

44. My Government will continue to work with other developing nations. It will contribute to all efforts at peace in West Asia through the establishment of a viable Palestinian State at the earliest. The traditionally close ties with countries in the Gulf will be strengthened. The process of engagement with Africa reenergized with the first Indo-Africa Summit organized by my Government will be further expanded. The multi-dimensional partnerships with countries in South-East Asia and the Pacific as well as Central Asia and the Latin American region will be consolidated.

45. The Indian diaspora estimated at over twenty-five million across the world is an important economic, social and cultural force and my Government will deepen its engagement with it. Our ties and kinship with the diaspora make us acutely conscious of their well-being and to be sensitive to their concerns. As a responsible member of the international community, India will work with other countries in tackling issues of common concern such as international terrorism, the global economic crisis, climate change, energy security and reform of multilateral institutions to reflect contemporary realities.

028. Address by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to members of Diplomatic Corps based in New Delhi.

New Delhi, June 8, 2009.

Excellencies,

It gives me great pleasure to have this opportunity to meet all of you today.

Your presence today is evidence of the friendship and partnership between India and the international community. Our Government is committed to working with each of your countries for shared peace, prosperity and security.

Excellencies, India has changed significantly since the launch of bold economic reforms to unleash her economic potential. India is today the fourth largest economy in the world in terms of purchasing power parity. Despite the global impact of the recent economic crisis, India remains among the fastest growing economies of the world.

Our Government is committed to all-round, inclusive growth. To achieve this, a peaceful extended neighbourhood and a supportive international environment remains our fundamental foreign policy objective. India, as a responsible power, does and will engage actively with the world, while pursuing an independent and non-aligned foreign policy of peace and development, as well as strengthening her strategic autonomy.

As we do so, we will continue to focus on addressing the challenges of technological self-reliance, food and energy security. We will engage more closely with the global community and all our partners to deal with international terrorism which threatens us all.

India has an abiding interest in the stability and prosperity of our neighbours. We also believe that a prosperous and economically vibrant India is an asset and opportunity for our region. In this new term of our Government, we look forward to further strengthening our relationship with the neighbours. Our relations are further strengthened by the bonds of history, cultural affinities and geography. South Asia has always prospered when it has been interconnected. We therefore hope to continue to work towards reestablishing these links and towards greater economic integration. We will make every effort to take the SAARC agenda forward through deeper cooperation in South Asia that focuses on the primary task of reducing poverty and improving the quality of life of the common people. We will also work with our neighbours to ensure that outstanding issues are addressed and the full potential of our region is realized.

We attach great importance to taking forward our political, economic and cultural relations with countries in West Asia and the Gulf region with whom we share historical and cultural ties spanning over two millennia. Today, our cooperation has extended to several contemporary domains that include cooperation in the peaceful uses of outer space, including the use of Indian launch vehicles. This vast region, taken broadly, is also home to nearly five million Indian expatriates whose endeavours have had a significant impact on your economies and ours. Our common security concerns also call for mutually beneficial cooperation in the protection of sea lanes of commerce against the scourge of piracy. In this regard, we appreciate the cooperation extended to us by various countries in the region.

India has consistently supported the peaceful resolution of the conflict in West Asia in a manner that would result in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine, living within secure and recognized borders, side by side and at peace with Israel.

Our efforts to cultivate stronger bonds with countries of the Latin American and Caribbean region have borne impressive results in recent years, with cross-sectoral dialogue at various levels and a framework of institutionalized mechanisms for mutually beneficial cooperation. We will work towards bringing the region closer to us politically, with even more intensified contact. We are pleased that our trade and economic interaction with the region has been substantially enhanced. There are still enormous opportunities waiting to be explored and utilized.

We wish to further consolidate our relations with our friends in North America, with whom we share many commonalities and complementarities. We look forward to forging a new, higher level of strategic partnership with them.

Given our strong historical and cultural links with them, Russia and Central Asian countries occupy an important place in India's foreign policy. Cooperation in energy, science and technology, and space has witnessed concrete developments in recent years. We wish to engage more closely with that region by ensuring that our cooperation with Central Asia receives even greater substance and diversification.

The India-Africa Forum Summit held in New Delhi last year has created a new architecture for the India-Africa partnership in the 21st century. The new road map, built on the firm foundations of historical and people-to-people contacts that have existed between India and Africa for centuries, will bring greater substance by unlocking the latent potential in India's engagement with Africa. Our support to Africa's economic well-being and to peace and security in the continent will remain unflinching and will be further intensified.

With our friends in Europe, we will pursue with greater vigour the process of qualitative transformation of our engagement that has been achieved in the recent years. Our friendship draws upon our rich cultural and historic heritage.

We have maintained and intensified our engagement with EU, a strategic partner, as well as individual countries in Europe in diverse fields such as defense & security, nuclear and space, trade and investment, energy, climate change, science and technology, culture and education. EU is today our largest trading partner. It is also one of our major sources of investment. We will continue this process of qualitative transformation of our engagement with EU and other European countries with greater vigour. India and the EU are indispensable poles in the emerging multipolar world.

In our strides towards economic progress, Asia in general and East and Southeast Asia in particular, continues to be a natural partner for enabling complementarities.

We see cooperation between India and ASEAN, as well as countries in the Asia Pacific, as an important dimension of our diplomacy in the 21st century as reflected in our "Look East" policy, which is built on a strong economic foundation and a cooperative paradigm of converging security interests.

Excellencies, this is our first interaction since I took over as India's External Affairs Minister a week ago. With this beginning, I hope we will have many more opportunities to meet in the future. I look forward to working closely with you to realize our shared vision of mutually beneficial partnership and common prosperity.

Thank you!

029 . Extracts from the Speech of the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh replying to the debate in the Lok Sabha on the Motion of Thanks to the President for her Address to the Parliament.

New Delhi, June 9, 2009.

Madam Speaker, I join all other Members of this august House in conveying our very sincere thanks to the Respected Rashtrapatiji for a very thought-provoking Address. I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the Leader of the Opposition, Shri L. K. Advani, other senior Leaders including Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav, Shri Lalu Prasad and many other distinguished personalities who have spoken on the Address of the hon. President. I sense an underlying sense of unity is what our Republic is about. What are the tasks that lie ahead and how we should go about in achieving those objectives?

* * * * *

In his speech, the hon. Leader of the Opposition, Shri L.K. Advani, mentioned that the Centre has been blamed for certain lapses by the Commission of Inquiry set up by the Maharashtra Government in connection with the terrorist attack in Mumbai on November 26. As Members of Parliament are aware, the Government of Maharashtra had set up a Two-member Commission of Inquiry to inquire into the events of that day and the manner in which the State Government had responded to the attack. I understand that the Commission of Inquiry has submitted its Report to the State Government. The State Government would, no doubt, be tabling the Report in the Maharashtra Legislature, together possibly with an Action Taken Report. It is not possible, therefore, to comment at this stage on the contents of the Report of the Commission of Inquiry before the Report is formally tabled on the floor of the State Legislature. I shall, therefore, refrain from commenting on the inferences drawn by the hon. Leader of the Opposition about a Report that is yet to be placed on the floor of the State Assembly.

I would, however, like to inform the House about the several steps that have been taken since November 2008 to further tighten the vigil against future terrorist attacks of this nature. As Members are aware, the perpetrators of the November 26 attack came by sea. We were all aware of our vulnerability to such attacks from this quarter and had taken already a number of steps, but obviously these were inadequate. A massive effort has hence been taken to streamline our maritime security which included the setting up of a Maritime Command under the Coast Guard with overall responsibility vested with our Navy.

I am sure we have increased the number of Marine Police Stations to supplement the efforts of the Coast Guard and the Navy. There have been several other steps that have been taken. But I shall enumerate only a few. Improvements in intelligence sharing is one. The Multi Agency Centre has been fully energised and Subsidiary Multi Agency Centres constituted in more States. The process will be completed shortly. The Net564 Centric Information Command structure is being put in place to achieve online transfer of all actionable intelligence in a streamlined manner. Generation of actionable intelligence has simultaneously been given priority and measures put in place for this purpose. Technical innovation and technical support to intelligence production has been given the highest priority. Steps have also been taken to improve the quality of intelligence analysis. Investigation into serious terrorist offences will, from now on, be the responsibility of the newly-constituted National Investigation Agency.

Additional legal measures taken include - apart from the new National NIA Act - significant amendments to the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act. The Home Minister is in constant dialogue with Chief Ministers of States keeping them informed of the specific aspects of the two new pieces of legislation. Madam, following the terrorist attacks in Mumbai on 26th November, 2008, the imperative necessity to have dedicated counter terrorist forces has been further reinforced.

The National Security Guard is the principal counter terrorist force in the country. A major effort has been made to improve its capability, improving better mobility and state-of-the-art equipment. At least, four new NSG hubs have been set up in different parts of the country. In addition, certain other dedicated counter terrorist forces are sought to be created.

Madam, it goes without saying that both the challenges of the troubled times that we live in terms of security of our nation and the unique opportunities within our reach for the well being of our people, enjoin us to work together for common goals. I am grateful to the hon. leaders of the Opposition who offered their support on both these counts. I consider it the duty of my Government to build further unity of purpose. I have always felt that our differences will melt away when we consider the overwhelming nature of the challenge that our country faces.

Madam, I would like to say a few words about our relations with our neighbours. We are living in a neighbourhood of great turbulence. I have believed India cannot realize its ambitions unless there is peace and prosperity in South Asia as a whole and if our neighbourhood is suffering from instability, turbulence that has direct bearing on our own evolution as a democratic polity committed to sustained growth and development. I have, therefore, a vision for a transformed South Asia where, with the cooperation of all our neighbours, we move from poverty to prosperity, from ignorance to knowledge society and from insecurity to lasting peace. What is at stake is the future of one-and-a-half billion people living in South Asia. I sincerely believe it is in our vital interest therefore to try again to make peace with Pakistan. I recognise, it takes two hands to clap. There are some disturbing trends, but I do hope that the Government of Pakistan will create an atmosphere in which we can realize this vision. I expect the Government of Pakistan to take strong, effective and sustained action to prevent the use of their territory for the commission of acts of terrorism in India, or against Indian interests, and use every means at their disposal to bring to justice those who have committed these crimes in the past, including the attack on Mumbai. I believe that such actions will be welcomed by the peoples of both countries. If the leaders of Pakistan have the courage, the determination and statesmanship to take this road to peace, I wish to assure them that we will meet them more than half way.

I should say a few words about Sri Lanka. We have centuries-old ties with the people of Sri Lanka and we have a deep and abiding interest in the well-being of the Tamil people in that country. The Tamil problem is larger than the LTTE and I sincerely hope that the Sri Lankan Government will show imagination and courage in meeting the legitimate concerns and aspirations of the Tamil people to live their lives as equal citizens and with dignity and self-respect. We have been taking an active part in the relief and rehabilitation of the Internally Displaced Persons in Sri Lanka and I have already earmarked Rs.500 crore for this purpose. We are willing to do more to restore normalcy and to return such people to their rightful homes and occupations.

In this House as well as in the other House, Members have expressed concerns about the developments in Australia. Madam, Australia has emerged as a major destination for Indian students. Like many other Members who have spoken in this House, I have been appalled by the senseless violence and crime, some of it racially motivated against our students in Australia. I propose to engage the authorities in Australia in a high level dialogue with a view to taking stock of the situation and to providing adequate security for Indian students.

Madam, I have already spoken to Prime Minister Rudd of Australia on this subject. He assured me that any racist attacks on Indian students would be strongly dealt with. He made a Statement in Parliament in which he condemned and deplored the attacks and said that they were unacceptable. He emphasised that Australia is a multicultural nation which respects and embraces diversity. He said that these would be countered with the full force of the law.

Madam, I do not wish to under-play the anxiety of the parents of our students, but I wish to request the media to be mindful of the fact that there are over 200,000 Australian citizens of Indian origin. We should be mindful of their interests and avoid willy-nilly creating a situation where these citizens of Australia of Indian origin become the targets of racist intolerance. India and Australia have very good relations and it has been our effort to widen and deepen these ties in the last five years.

Madam, I should say a few words about our relations with China. Hon. Members have raised the issue of our relations with China and I should say that China is our strategic partner. We have a multi-faceted relationship with China. There is enough space- I have said so often - for both China and India to develop and contribute to global peace, stability and prosperity. We do not see our relations with China in antagonistic terms. We have a large trading relationship, we consult each other on global issues, whether in the G-20 process on climate change or terrorism, and we share a common commitment to maintain peace and tranquility on our border.

There are, of course, issues which are complex such as the boundary question. But we have agreed upon a mechanism to address this matter. We wish to build a strong and stable relationship with China. This is in the mutual interest of both our countries. I have been assured by the Chinese leadership - I have interacted with them extensively in the last five years - that they also subscribe to the views I have expressed just now. But whether it is China or any country, we will ensure the territorial integrity and unity of our country and protect the security in every manner necessary. The House should have no misgiving on that score.

Madam, the President's Address has covered a vast territory. I could not do justice to all the points that have been raised. But as I listened to the debate, I was struck by an underlying sense of unity on all sides that India should move forward as a united nation to achieve its coveted place in the comity of nations. That is the mandate, a mandate for change, a mandate for inclusive development, a mandate to strengthen the secular foundations of our magnificent republic. It is to these tasks that I commit our Government and I invite all hon. Members to join me in passing this Motion of Thanks unanimously.

Thank you.

030. Extracts from the Speech of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh replying to the debate in the Rajya Sabha on the Motion of Thanks to the President for her address to the Parliament.

New Delhi, June 9, 2009.

* * * *

Coming to the issues of foreign policy, I think Shri Arun Jaitley drew my attention to the non-mention of the problems that are emerging in Australia. In this context, I would like to point out that I do agree that our students have been subject matter of unacceptable attacks in some parts of Australia.

Australia today has emerged as a major destination for Indian students. I have been appalled by the senseless violence and crime, some of it is racially motivated against our students in Australia. I propose to engage the authorities in Australia in a high-level dialogue with a view to taking stock of the situation and to provide adequate security for our students.

In this context, I would like to mention to the hon. House that I have already spoken to the Prime Minister Kevin Rudd on this subject. He assured me that any racist attacks on Indian students would be strongly dealt with. He made a statement in the Parliament in which he condemned and deplored the attacks and said that they were unacceptable. He emphasized that Australia is a multi-cultural nation, which respects and embraces diversity. He said that these would be countered with the full force of the law. I do not wish to underplay or minimise the anxieties of the parents of our students but I wish to request the media to be mindful of the fact that there are over 2,00,000 Australian citizens of Indian origin. We should be mindful of their interests and avoid creating a situation where they become the target of racist intolerance.

India and Australia have very good relations and it has been our effort to widen and deepen these ties in the last five years. Sir, Shri Arun Shourie referred to the problems that we have with Pakistan. He questioned our understanding of the nature of the Pakistan State, whether it is sufficiently embedded into our thinking or not. Let me mention to him respectfully that Pakistan is our neighbour. We can choose our friends but we have to live with neighbours as we got. When I look at the history of the modern world, I look at the relations between the United States and Iran. I think, they have gone through difficult periods extending over last thirty years, but, ultimately, even the mighty power like the United States have found that it is necessary to come to terms with the reality of the Iranian situation, and, therefore, there is no other alternative but to pursue the path of dialogue.

It is in the same context, Sir, that I would say that I have a vision for a transformed South Asia where with the cooperation of all our neighbours, we move from poverty to prosperity, from ignorance to a knowledge-society, and, from security to lasting peace. I sincerely believe that India cannot realise its development ambition or its ambition of being a great power, if our neighbourhood remains disturbed as it is, and, therefore, it is in our interest to work with all neighbouring countries to ensure a peaceful neighbourhood.

What is at stake, Sir, is the future of one and a half billion people of humanity. I sincerely believe that it is in our vital interest, therefore, to try again to make peace with Pakistan. But I recognize that it takes two hands to clap. I sincerely hope that the Government of Pakistan will create an atmosphere in which we can realise this vision. I expect the Government of Pakistan to take strong, effective and sustained actions to prevent the use of their territory for the commission of acts of terrorism in India or against Indian interest, and, use every means at their disposal to bring to justice those who have committed these crimes in the past including the attack on Mumbai. I believe that such actions will be welcomed by the people of both countries. If the leaders of Pakistan have the courage, the determination and statesmanship to take this road to peace, I wish to assure them that we will meet them more than half-way.

Sir, in this House references were made to the Tamil problem in Sri Lanka. We have been grappling with that problem for the last five years. And, I know what is at stake with all of us. We have centuries old ties with the people of Sri Lanka and we have an abiding interest in the well being of the Tamil population in that country. The Tamil problem is much bigger and much larger than the LTTE problem, and I sincerely hope that the Sri Lankan Government will show due imagination and courage in meeting the legitimate concerns and aspirations of the Tamil people to live their lives as equal citizens and with dignity and self-respect. We have been taking an active part in the release and rehabilitation of the internally-displaced persons in Sri Lanka. We have already earmarked Rs. 500 crores for this purpose. We are willing to do more to restore normalcy and to return such people to their rightful homes and occupations.

Sir, there has been concern about internal security, the menace of terrorism, the menace of Left Wing Extremism. I would be the last one to say that if these activities are not under control, our economic vision can also get affected. If terrorism is not under control and if some important parts of our country in Central India are the victims of Left Wing Extremism, I think that can have a serious adverse effect on the climate for investment or the climate for development. Therefore, we will do all that we can to deal with these menaces of terrorism, aided and abetted from abroad as well as Left Wing Extremism.

I should like to inform the House about the several steps that have been taken since November 2008 to further tighten our vigilance against future terrorist attacks of this nature. As Members are aware, the perpetrators of November 26 attack came by sea. We were well aware of our vulnerability to such attacks from this quarter and had already taken a number of steps, but obviously these steps were not adequate. A massive effort has hence been undertaken to streamline our maritime security, which included the setting up of a Maritime Command under the Coastal Guard with overall responsibility vested in our name. I am sure we have increased the number of marine police stations to supplement the efforts of the Coast Guard and the Navy.

Sir, there have been several other steps that have been taken, but I shall enumerate only a few. Improvement in intelligence sharing is one. The multi agency centre has been fully energized and subsidiary multi agency centres constituted in more States. The process will be completed shortly. A net-centric information command structure is being set up in place to achieve online transfer of all actionable intelligence in a streamlined manner. I take note of the problem that arises with the institution of this net-centric information centre. Shri Arun Shourie pointed out to some drawbacks and vulnerability. I am sure our security agencies will take note of the comments that he has made. Generation of actionable intelligence has simultaneously been given priority and measures put in place for this purpose. Technical innovation and technical support to intelligence production have been given the highest priority. Steps have also been taken to improve the quality of intelligence analysis. Investigation into serious terrorist offences will from now on be the responsibility of the newly constituted National Investigation Agency. Additional legal measures taken include, apart from the new NIA Act, significant amendments to the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act. The Home Minister is in constant dialogue with the Chief Ministers of States keeping them informed of specific aspect of the two new pieces of legislation.

Following the terrorist attack in Mumbai on 26th November, the imperative necessity to have dedicated counter-terrorist forces has been further enforced. The National Security Guard is the principal counterterrorist force in the country. A major effort has been made to improve its capabilities, including better mobility and state-of-the-art equipment. At least, four new NSG hubs are being set up in different parts of the country. In addition, other dedicated counter-terrorist forces are sought to be created.

Similarly, Sir, with regard to Left Wing Extremism, I should briefly mention the strategy that is being adopted. While appreciating that many of the crimes committed by Left Wing Extremism fall into the domain of the State Government, the Central Government will orchestrate coordinated action. Extremist movements feed on the disaffection of tribes and forest dwellers who still often face denial of access to natural resources and equal development opportunities. I had mentioned in the other House and I would like to repeat it here. We have several programmes of tribal development. But they do not seem to have made the desired impact and this whole area, therefore, calls for a fresh review to end centuries old inequity that I think has been the inevitable lot of a large number of tribal communities over the years. We will undertake a thorough review of the development programme and see how they can be revitalized and also ensure that we put some of the best motivated officials in charge of development programme in the tribal areas.

031. Interview of the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna with Pranay Sharma of the Weekly Outlook.

New Delhi, June 22, 2009.

[Dressed nattily in kurta-pyjama and waistcoat, and readily agreeing to pose for the camera, Union minister for external affairs S.M. Krishna lacks the inhibition and self-consciousness typical of those inducted into the Union cabinet for the first time. A surprise choice to fashion India's foreign policy for the next five years, the suave and urbane minister spoke to Pranay Sharma on a range of issues with the elan of a man born to diplomacy. His furious pace of work over the next few weeks, as he noted with some regret, will deprive him of a chance to visit Wimbledon to watch the tennis matches there later this month].:

What will it take for the India-Pakistan dialogue to restart?

We are all for the dialogue to be restarted. Pakistan has assured us a number of times before that terror directed against India will not be allowed to emanate from its soil. But those assurances have remained only on paper. 26/11 was an assault on India directed from Pakistani soil. Unfortunately, the attack on India prompted us to call off the dialogue which had been taking place—and which had made considerable progress.

So, what kind of signal are we looking for before restarting the dialogue?

We want Pakistan to act against those responsible for the attack on India. They need to be tried under Pakistani laws and punished. We also want a categorical assurance that such incidents will not be repeated from Pakistani soil. Unfortunately, they (the 26/11 masterminds) have not been punished. Consequently, much as we may like to go ahead with the dialogue, these are obstacles that are there before us.

Does India still regard Pakistan as a state sponsor of terrorism? Most of the terrorist attacks against India have emanated from Pakistani soil. And that's a fact we will have to bear in mind.

And so far, there's nothing to prove otherwise?

Offers for dialogue have been coming from Pakistan at regular intervals. But certain conditions will have to be met for a meaningful dialogue to take place. Dialogue for the sake of dialogue helps no party. A dialogue has to be meaningful; if it has to be meaningful, it has to have commitments from both sides. And as long as there are no commitments from Pakistan on how they plan to tackle the terrorist attacks that are directed against India, any dialogue will not be meaningful.

Pakistan has witnessed a number of terrorist attacks and has taken several steps to fight terrorism. Given this, can India push Pakistan to take action against those involved in the Mumbai attacks?!

India has been trying repeatedly to bring to the notice of the Pakistani government that terror is something all of us will have to fight and we have to do it together. Terror is abominable, terror knows no boundary. We will have to wait and watch for Pakistan's response to that.

But are there encouraging signs to make India think that Pakistan is doing something about terror?

I haven't seen anything concrete to say that attempts are being made against the terror instruments that have roots in Pakistani soil.

The Pakistani government has been taking steps to fight terrorists in some parts of its country. But if it fails to take action against those responsible for Mumbai, can India convince the world about the lack of sincerity on Islamabad's part to fight terror?

The world will be watching with concern the repeated attacks on India from Pakistani soil. And they can draw their own conclusion about the Pakistani government's seriousness to tackle terror.

Following Pakistani action in Swat, there's a perception that it's serious about dismantling the terror structure. Since that is India's demand too, are you satisfied with their action?

What's happening in Pakistan is certainly its concern. For terrorist activities that are directed against the Pakistani Government, they will naturally have to take necessary action. But what we are interested in is to see that Pakistan comes out forcefully against all those who are conspiring against India. Pakistan should take a determined stance against all those forces and that's what we are looking forward to.

Do we think Pakistan is also a victim of terrorism?

Yes, there has been attacks in recent months in different cities in Pakistan. And therefore, Pakistan should take a lesson that terrorisms directed against India today may be directed against them tomorrow. So they need to fight those forces with a strong degree of commitment. Unfortunately that's yet to be seen from Pakistan.

President Asif Ali Zardari said that Pakistan no longer considers India as its main threat. Does India also think that Pakistan is not a threat to it?

We always wanted to have good relations with Pakistan. I'm happy that President Zardari said so. At no point of time were we a threat to Pakistan. We want to tell Pakistan that we want it to develop and grow as good neighbours. It's in our interest to see a stable Pakistan.

Have the Americans ever asked us to restart the dialogue with Pakistan? You met US under-secretary of state William Burns as well...

It didn't come up during my meeting with William Burns. But ours is a responsible government. We certainly listen to whatever suggestion is given to us. Ultimately, though, it's India's national interest which dictates our foreign policy.

Do we see the recent attacks against Indian students in Australia as racist?

Some of those attacks are racially motivated and the Australian government itself has said so. We have an excellent relationship with Australia. There are about 90,000 Indian students who are pursuing their studies in Australia. There are 2,00,000 Indian families settled in Australia and are now its citizens. We have been assured by the highest authorities—the Australian prime minister himself—that the welfare of the students will be taken care of.

The military campaign in Sri Lanka is now over. How can India now ensure that the Sri Lankan government remains committed to taking urgent steps to address the aspirations of the Tamil minority in the island?

As had been spelt out by the prime minister in Parliament, the resettlement of the displaced Tamilians will have to take place on an urgent basis. Thousands of people have been displaced and they will have to be resettled in their own land, their hamlets, their own towns. The Indian government has promised monetary support to help the resettlement of these displaced Tamilians. We hope the Sri Lankan government will give due priority to this settlement question.

Some feel that Indo-US relations now will not enjoy the same importance as they did under the George Bush presidency...

Our relationship with the US is very good. We'd like to engage the US on various subjects—on space technology, civil nuclear energy, the energy sector. I don't share the perception that it will now become less important. Our relationship has not altered. The opportunity for these two democracies to work closely together is very much there.

US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is due to come here next month. What's expected from the visit?

It has now been confirmed that she will be visiting India in the third week of July. I personally will be very happy to receive Secretary Clinton. She has been here as the First Lady of the US. We should be able to forge a good understanding and relationship with her and I look forward to the visit.

032. Keynote Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the Annual General Meeting of Global Compact Society on the theme of 'Making a Business Case for Ethical and Transparent Corporate Culture'.

New Delhi, June 29, 2009.

Mr. R.S. Sharma, President of the Global Compact Society,

Admiral R.H. Tahilani, Chairman, Transparency International India

Ms. Christina Albertin, South Asia Regional Representative, UNODC

Mr. Uddesh Kohli Distinguished Guests

Ladies & Gentlemen

Friends:

It's a privilege for me to join you at the Annual General Meeting of the Global Compact Society. As Mr. Sharma has told you, in my previous hat at the United Nations, I was privileged to be "present at the creation" when Secretary General Kofi Annan made his historic call at Davos for a Global Compact that would bring business in line with the labour, environmental and human rights standards already agreed by Governments. It is therefore with particular pleasure that I accepted this invitation to address you today. But George Kell's words that you read aloud this evening are far too generous for what was truly a collective effort – and please tell him I said so.

2. The theme of today's workshop - "Making a Business Case for Ethical and Transparent Corporate Conduct" is not only topical but a reflection of the scale of the challenge that governments, corporates and civil society are confronted with. The idea that business should be conducted ethically is not a new one. Neither is the idea that business should be conducted in a socially responsible manner. For most of the last century, the responsibility for setting standards for the conduct of business and ensuring that economic wealth was shared across all segments of society was assumed by governments either acting individually or collectively. International organizations such as the United Nations of course, and the ILO and governments around the world have set international human and labour rights standards, which were proclaimed as having universal applicability. By assuming primary responsibility for social concerns and environmental standards, governments left businesses free to focus attention on the production of goods and services and the maximization of profits.

3. Now this division of responsibilities has had significant implications for the perceived role of business ethics and corporate social responsibility. It has tended to encourage corporations to define their social and ethical responsibilities narrowly. In most countries the belief that the primary purpose of business was to enrich owners and shareholders has provided companies and their managers with a justification for not getting involved in broader social issues touching on human rights or working conditions, or the quality of life of the people in the communities in which they generated their profits. In an effort to retain shareholder interest, managements in many places have become slaves to the stock market. Misplaced faith in efficient markets that are self-regulating have left some corporates unabashedly pursuing profits, giving short-shrift to good corporate governance practices. The practice of quarterly and half-yearly reporting has worsened matters as corporates feel obliged to report stellar growth during every reporting period. This obligation has thrown open the doors to the wizardry of financial engineering and the result is what has led to some of the world's worst corporate frauds.

4. The collapse of Satyam, India's fourth largest IT firm, raised questions about corporate governance in India, the scope and scale of corporate corruption, the causes, and underlying trends. With globalization and the sudden surge of India on the world stage, several domestic companies which wanted to list on bourses overseas, to attract foreign capital and to establish a global footprint found it prudent to adopt sound corporate global governance practices. The Securities Exchange Board of India, taking a cue from the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 in the US introduced Clause 49 in 2005 which required listed companies to seat more independent directors on boards and audit committees; a code of conduct for board members; a larger role for the audit committee; and mandatory risk assessments and certification by the CEO and CFO of the effectiveness of internal accounting controls. The Satyam catastrophe happened not due to lack of corporate governance laws in India, but despite India instituting corporate governance reforms, consisting of some of the best practices in leading equity markets around the world. In fact, just last year, Satyam won the “Golden Peacock” Award for Corporate Governance from the London-based World Council for Corporate Governance. In other words, the appearance of good corporate governance is one thing, and adherence to ethical norms at the decision-making level is another. One can sign a global compact in public and make a compact with the devil in private.

5. The fall of many leading corporates such as Enron, WorldCom, and Parmalat in recent years has brought one clear message to the fore: ethics matter in business. In early 2004 the first ever European Conference for ethics and compliance practitioners called “Sharing Ideas and Best Practices in Business Ethics,” was held in Paris, and around 100 corporate ethics practitioners from nine countries attended it. The main takeaway from the conference was that the sooner companies begin discussing and enacting processes for managing integrity standards within their organizations, the better. In India senior business leaders have to start giving more thought to this area of organizational behavior, start framing their beliefs on integrity standards, circulate these among their employees and get their views and affirmation on adherence to these standards. More important, senior leaders must create communication platforms that encourage employees (and other associates of the company) to raise concerns related to possible or actual deviations from integrity standards especially those that could damage the reputation of the organization. All such platforms and processes must become institutionalized in due course.

6. Kenneth Goodpaster, professor of business ethics at the University of St. Thomas, Minneapolis in the US emphasizes that “business leaders are the principal architects of corporate conscience. They are the ones who must manage the challenges associated with pursuing profit while maintaining integrity. They are the ones most responsible for delivering on the moral agenda of the corporation. That agenda includes three broad imperatives: orienting, institutionalizing and sustaining ethical values within the corporate culture.” Given the high competitive pressures, it is easy for business leaders to say that enforcing ethical conduct is difficult, but this is not an excuse they can use. As my friend, Jeffrey Garten, the former Dean of the Yale School of Management, wrote in his book – The Politics of Fortune: A New Agenda for Business Leaders, “the more complex the markets become, the more the integrity of its leaders matters”.

7. Our own country's timeless epic the Bhagavad Gita, which, as you know, is a record of the conversation between the Supreme Deity Krishna and prince Arjuna, struggling with a moral crisis before a crucial battle, prescribes that enlightened leaders should master all impulses or emotions that cloud sound judgment. Good leaders are selfless, they take initiative, and they focus on their duty rather than obsessing over outcomes or financial gains. The Gita espouses the doctrine of nishkama karma or pure action untainted by hankering after the fruits resulting from that action. The seemingly transcendent world view that's reflected in Indian philosophy is surprisingly well attuned to the needs of companies trying to survive in an increasingly interconnected and more and more ethically conscious business world.

8. The late Sumantra Ghoshal, founding Dean of the Indian School of Business, Hyderabad was of the view that executives should be motivated by a broader purpose than mere profit making. Companies should take a more holistic approach to business – one that takes into account the needs of the shareholders, the employees, customers, society and the environment. There is an urgent need today for the development of a management theory that replaces the shareholder-driven agenda with a more stakeholder-focused approach. Management Guru C.K. Prahalad, another good friend, describes such a theory as “inclusive capitalism” – the idea that corporations can simultaneously create value and promote social justice.

9. The best practices in corporate governance can emerge when informed by an established set of business principles and a defined approach towards organizational behavior. Without such business ethics, governance stands bereft of a well-reasoned rationale. Left to itself, corporate governance runs the real risk of becoming a mere form-filling exercise, dedicated to observing the appearance of social responsibility. The roadmap, therefore, has to be based on substance, which means adhering to a dedicated code of behavioural norms in its spirit.

10. The American Management Association in its study entitled “The Ethical Enterprise, A Global Study of Business Ethics” reported that the number one factor likely to cause people to compromise ethical standards was pressure to meet unrealistic business objectives and deadlines. Managements must therefore strive to balance business objectives with the reality of their resources and must continually remind employees that ethics are sacrosanct. Corporates also need to cultivate a transparent business culture and institute a corporate code of ethics, the value of which would be significantly enhanced if consistently enforced.

11. Since 1991, economic liberalization in India has reduced red tape and bureaucracy and has supported our nation's transition towards a market economy achieving record growth rates in excess of 8% in each of the last five years – well last year was slightly less but you know why. Though in PPP terms India ranks among the top five economies in the world, the fruits of economic growth have been unevenly distributed across the social spectrum. Corruption to an extent has contributed to this uneven distribution of wealth and has undermined government efforts to reduce poverty and to promote economic growth. Though there have been a number of reports and studies that emphasize that corruption and bribery are endemic in the country and pose a grave challenge to the government, and given the rousing call given by Mr. Tahiliani a few minutes ago, India's performance on the 2008 Global Integrity Index has been relatively positive. India is ranked 11th among 55 countries for governance and anti-corruption standards. The report confirmed the good quality of the legal framework against corruption in India, with existing legislation in line with most of the requirements of the UN Convention against Corruption. The challenge before the government is to ensure the successful implementation of existing legislation.

12. Now, the fight against corruption has been declared a high priority by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. The Right to Information Act – the RTI Act – passed in 2005 represents one of the country's most critical achievements in the fight against corruption in recent years. The law aims to ingrain accountability and transparency in public functioning, as it specifically provides for hefty fines and disciplinary action against erring officials. In terms of international norms, India has signed the UN Convention against Corruption and the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. There are various bodies in place for implementing anti-corruption policies and raising awareness on corruption issues such as, of course, the Supreme Court itself, the Central Vigilance Commission (CVC), the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), the Office of the Controller and Auditor General of India (CAG), and the Chief Information Commissioner (CIC). Moreover, government initiative in the area of e-governance has considerably increased the speed of government services in a number of areas and reduced opportunities for bribery. A wide range of public services have been digitized such as obtaining licenses, paying taxes, and clearing goods. The National Portal of India, a single window access to information on digitized services provided by various Indian Government entities, has also been created.

13. India, and you are all evidence of it, enjoys a vigorous and vibrant civil society and enjoys arguably the freest media in Asia. Both have played an important role in placing corruption on the national agenda. Freedom of Association is fully guaranteed and the formation of interested groups is both permitted and encouraged, contributing to a proliferation of civil society organizations such as the Indian chapter of Transparency International India, the Centre for Media Studies, Parivartan, and other examples. The Centre for Media Studies is a non-profit multi-disciplinary research agency which has undertaken corruption tracking surveys since 2000. Parivartan was established around that time at the turn of the millennium as an attempt to expose irregularities within the Income Tax Department in New Delhi. The movement now focuses on using the RTI Act to promote transparency and accountability in public services. The RTI Act has opened up critical opportunities for civil society involvement in the fight against corruption. It has allowed civil society organizations to participate in debates on public spending and helped them to uncover corrupt practices in many states and projects.

14. Today many corporations are revising quite dramatically their conception of their social responsibilities. Though India has one of the world's richest traditions of corporate social responsibility (CSR), there is a need, I believe, to raise awareness across the country that CSR is a business imperative, not just a window-dressing. A number of Indian companies have realized that there is a strong business case for pursuing CSR strategies. The idea behind the Global Compact - that what is good for the environment, workers, and for the community is also good for the financial performance of business - is gaining ground. With the retreat of the state in economic activity in India, the imperative for business to take up wider social responsibilities is growing. While business cannot be expected to take on the role of the government, in a country like India where a considerable proportion of the population lives below the poverty line and the government is faced with a multitude of challenges, CSR itself has a potential for becoming an instrument of change.

15. For many companies in India, being a good corporate citizen is a vital aspect of their identity, their values and their vision. For Industrial houses such as the Tatas and Birlas concepts of nation-building and trusteeship have been an intrinsic part of their business model long before the CSR term came into vogue and became a popular cause. At public sector enterprises such as BHEL, HDFC, NTPC and ONGC (our public sector is alas, beset by acronyms) but anyway, social obligations remain an integral part of their business. Over 200 Indian companies have already joined the UN Global Compact Initiative, which provides an extremely relevant vehicle for Indian business, academic institutions and civil society organizations to join hands towards strengthening responsible business initiatives in India and abroad. More and more corporations in India are coming up with “ethics codes”, which encompass guidelines on human rights, child labor, working conditions, and obligations to a wide variety of stakeholders. Equally striking is the appearance of ethics officers in the private sector whose primary responsibility is ensuring that ethical responsibilities are respected throughout their company’s operations. I shall try to conclude quickly. For we are all like Egyptian mummies, strapped for time.

16. I believe that there is a strong business case for ethical and transparent corporate conduct. In today’s global marketplace, companies will no longer be able to get away with treating corruption and bribery as “business as usual” or brush it away as a cultural phenomenon. The public outcry against corrupt and bribe paying corporates has become as loud as it has for environmental issues. Increasingly consumers are punishing unethical corporates by either avoiding the company’s products or speaking, writing or campaigning against such companies.

17. There are several factors that are driving the anti-corruption sentiment in both the public and the business community. The phenomenon of globalization has itself become a driving force for corporate social responsibility. The borderless global marketplace is bringing national economies and corporations into greater interdependence and businesses are increasingly realizing that corruption in one region can affect the entire global market. Publication of statistics such as the Bribe Payers Index (BPI) by Transparency International (covering 22 countries which account for over 75% of the global trade) has been a powerful tool for change. Globalization has called for replacing the traditional top-down supervision style with a more flattened system, where there is greater emphasis on shared understanding of responsibilities and rights. Many companies have concluded that if they are to be successful in very competitive environments, they must decentralize responsibility.

18. Another factor that has played a crucial role in changing business perceptions is the growth of technology that has transformed the global business environment. The activities of corporations are subject to greater global scrutiny and criticism wherever they are engaged in business. Unethical behavior no longer waits for investigation. We live in a world of citizen journalists armed with the new age WMD or Weapons of Mass Democracy such as the Youtube, or Twitter, the Blogs and even the mobile phone, where every voice irrespective of race, age, color or gender is heard, is welcome and is influential. 19. The global financial crisis has adequately demonstrated the negative effects of unbridled capitalism. This is not to say- not even to imply- that free markets are bad and that one has to rein the free spirit. Far from it. The answer is to arrive at a healthy balance between promulgating corporate governance regulations and promoting entrepreneurial initiatives. The need of the hour is to wed "capitalism" with "compassion" and set the stage for a new era where business respects transparency and accountability, and society takes precedence over profit making. I wish you a fruitful discussion and a successful workshop.

033. Vision of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh: 'How the world is governed in the 21st century'.

New Delhi, July 7, 2009.

Italy as President of the G-8 has brought out a compendium on contemporary global issues with contributions from world leaders on the occasion of the G-8 summit. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh is among the leaders whose views form part of the compendium. The PM's vision in the compendium are as follows:

Chapter 1: How the world is governed in the 21st Century

The Vision of Emerging Powers - India

Manmohan Singh

Prime Minister of India

As we near the end of the first decade of the 21st century, the challenges of global governance in an increasingly inter-connected and multi-polar world are truly formidable. Our institutions of global governance, centred on what may be called the UN system, were designed for the most part at the end of the Second World War and reflected the politico-economic realities of that age. The world was then dominantly bipolar, in the political and military sense, international trade and international capital flows were low, the developing countries were not economically important, indeed most of them were not even independent.

There has been a sea change since then. Bipolarity has given way to multipolarity, the developing countries are not only sovereign states but some group of developing countries have gained in relative economic importance and this trend will only gain momentum. The world has also become much more interconnected through the expansion of trade in goods and services and expansion of financial flows generated by capital account liberalisation. Interconnection has in turn greatly increased problems of contagion and vulnerability especially through financial linkages.

Our established institutions of global governance have evolved to some extent in response to these changes, but much less than they should have and the pace of evolution is likely to remain well behind the rate at which the world is changing. The centre piece of the post-war global architecture is the United Nations, conceived originally as the Parliament of the nations with the Security Council at its apex. The size of the international parliament has of course expanded and while there is occasional cynicism about how effectively the General Assembly can reflect global opinion, and especially evolve workable solutions on key issues, there is no doubt that it serves a valuable purpose in giving voice to every country.

However, this is not the same thing as saying that we have a structure which is functionally efficient and capable of dealing with the complex challenges the world faces today. The Security Council has not changed at all and its present structure poses serious problems of legitimacy. The system of two-tiered membership, which gives a veto to the five permanent members i.e. the nations that emerged victorious after the Second World War, is clearly anachronistic. Germany and Japan, which have significantly larger economies than Britain and France, both permanent members, are excluded. China is the only developing country in the P-5 and it is there for historical reasons, not as a large and economically important developing country. It is obvious that if the system was being designed today it would be very different. However, while the problems have long been recognised, efforts to reform the system have made little headway.

The unworkability of the existing structures has led to greater reliance on plurilateral groupings. Some of these such as the G-7, later expanded to the G-8, are to be seen as a group of countries with common interest, not necessarily representative of the global community. The original rationale of the G-7 was the belief that it would evolve more effective consultation among the more powerful countries on one side of the bipolar world of the 1970s and 1980s. Its expansion to the G-8 reflects the disappearance of that particular faultline by the collapse of the Soviet Union. However, while the Group includes many of the economically powerful nations, it is obviously not representative as it does not include any developing country.

Some years ago the G-8 has been expanded into the G-8 + 5 by adding China, India, Brazil, Mexico and South Africa. More recently, the group has been expanded even further to include a handful of countries in the name of achieving additional outreach. While these ad hoc expansions are a useful way of broadening the range of consultation undertaken by the G-8, it suffers from two limitations. The expanded group is not cohesive since the countries included for purposes of outreach do not participate fully in the proceedings, or the preparations, and the expanded group therefore does not have a composite identity. Second, these groupings do not have any special legitimacy within the UN System.

The deficiencies of the existing system of governance have been dramatically brought home during the recent international financial and economic crisis. The crisis has highlighted the fact that all economies are now highly inter connected and problems originating in one part of the world economy can quickly snowball into a global crisis. It has forcefully exposed fundamental weaknesses in the approach to financial regulation which emphasised light regulation and greater reliance on inhouse controls and market discipline to control risk. This approach gained popularity in the 1990s and is now perceived to have been overdone. The issue has revealed the inadequacies in the existing domestic regulatory systems in the industrialised countries and also in the international institutions set up to police these areas and to take remedial action when needed.

Whatever the causes and specific failures underlying the crisis, the world was quick to realise that a global crisis requires a global solution. It was also realised that the existing institutions of global governance did not permit effective coordination of a global response. The world therefore responded not by working within the existing system, but by convening a meeting of the G-20 at the level of leaders. The G-20 was established in 1999 at the suggestion of Paul Martin of Canada and has a composition which is somewhat different from the IMFC which meets regularly at Finance Ministers level. The G-20 has been meeting at the level of Finance Ministers since 1999. Recognising the seriousness of the crisis, the United States convened a meeting of the leaders of the Group of 20 in Washington D.C. in November 2008. The Group met again in London in April 2009. Unlike the G-8+5, this group has a composite identity since all member countries participate on equal terms including in the preparatory process. However, the selection of countries remains arbitrary and can be questioned as to its representativeness, especially since it departs from the composition of the IMFC which reflects the representation on the Board of the IMF.

The G-20 meeting in London certainly achieved a great deal more than normal meetings of this type, especially in two respects. First, it succeeded in expanding the perimeter of financial regulation and endorsing the establishment of global standards to which national standards can be aligned. These standards will be developed by the Financial Stability Forum (now renamed the Financial Stability Board) which has been expanded to include all G-20 countries that were not members earlier. Second it achieved a significant expansion in funding for the Bretton Woods Institutions. However, it did not achieve any significant reform of the international financial institutions. The Group has decided to meet again in September and it remains to be seen whether it will be able to evolve some ideas for making significant reforms by then.

The problems faced by the institutions of governance charged with handling the financial system are also relevant for other international institutions dealing with political and security issues, trade, climate change, etc. They need to update structures and upgrade work methods; reform decision-making and ensure effective delivery. They need to adapt, adjust and accommodate to adequately reflect ground realities, contemporary aspirations, and pressing requirements of developing countries including emerging economies.

India, as the largest democracy in the world and an emerging economy that has achieved the ability to grow rapidly, remains deeply committed to multilateralism. It has been an active member in global institutions - the United Nations, Bretton Woods Institutions, World Trade Organization, International Atomic Energy Agency and so on. It will continue to be so in the decades ahead, based on commitment to principles and values that define these institutions. India will seek its due place, play its destined role and share its assigned responsibility, giving voice to the hopes and aspirations of a billion people in South Asia. It will continue to strive for the reform of the United Nations to make it more democratic; to fight against the scourge of terrorism and dismantling its infrastructures on the basis of zero tolerance; to fight piracy on the high seas; to restructure the Bretton Woods Institutions to create a new financial architecture; to achieve an early conclusion of the Doha Round of trade negotiations, with its development dimension, and to address climate change issues, guided by the principle of common but differentiated responsibility and respective capability.

India's view of the world has always been guided by the wisdom of that ancient Indian saying - Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam - 'the whole world is one family'. This idea found expression in Jawaharlal Nehru's very first address as Prime Minister: "Those dreams are for India, but they are also for the world, for all the nations and peoples are too closely knit together today for any of them to imagine that it can live apart. Peace has been said to be indivisible; so is freedom, so is prosperity now and so also is disaster in this One World that can no longer be split into isolated fragments." That eternal message of the Indian people will guide us in our attempt to seek inclusive global solutions to intractable global problems, and give new hope to humanity.

034. Suo Motu Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in Parliament (Lok Sabha & Rajya Sabha) on "Significant developments in our neighbourhood."

New Delhi, July 9, 2009.

I rise to inform the House of significant developments in our relations with three important neighbours - Pakistan, Sri Lanka and Nepal.

2. Hon'ble Members will recall the Prime Minister's remarks in this House on June 9, 2009. He had said then that it is in our vital interest to make peace with Pakistan. In our vision of a cooperative and harmonious sub-continent, the relationship between India and Pakistan can be a critical building block. The Prime Minister had also referred to our intention of meeting Pakistan more than half way, if its leaders have the courage, determination and statesmanship to take the high road to peace. These sentiments encapsulate our approach. We also recognize the importance and salience of a continued dialogue with Pakistan. However, dialogue addressing mutual concerns is premised on an atmosphere free of the threat of violence. It was with this explicit premise that the Composite Dialogue Process was restarted in 2004. Despite achievements, the dialogue and our very relationship with Pakistan have come under stress recurrently because of the license which terrorist groups have had in Pakistan to carry out attacks on India.

3. Hon'ble Members are aware of the Government of Pakistan's assurances to us at the very highest level that it would not let territories under its control to be used for attacks against India. Notwithstanding these assurances, we have been repeatedly and severely hit by a series of terrorist attacks emanating from Pakistan. It is the responsibility of the Government of Pakistan to take all such steps as are necessary to address this issue and expose and take action against the conspiracies and conspirators responsible for such attacks. Unfortunately, terrorists in Pakistan continue attacks against India.

4. When the Prime Minister met President Asif Ali Zardari of Pakistan at the margins of the SCO Summit in Russia last month, the President of Pakistan told us of Pakistan's efforts to deal with the menace of terrorism and the difficulties that they face. It was agreed that the Foreign Secretaries of India and Pakistan will discuss what Pakistan is doing and can do to prevent terrorism from Pakistan against India and to bring to justice those responsible for these attacks, including the horrendous crime of the attacks in Mumbai. After the Foreign Secretaries report, we will be able to take stock of the situation at Sharm-el-Sheikh where, at the margins of the Non-Aligned Summit, Prime Minister will be meeting the Pakistani leadership.

Sri Lanka

5. Permit me now to briefly apprise the House of recent developments in Sri Lanka. As Hon'ble Members are aware, after more than two decades of conflict involving the Sri Lankan Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), a terrorist organisation proscribed in India, the Sri Lankan Government in mid-May 2009 proclaimed the end of military operations after wresting back all the territory held by the LTTE. The death of several LTTE leaders was also announced, including that of Velupillai Prabhakaran, who is a proclaimed offender in India. This is a significant conclusion to the military conflict in Northern Sri Lanka.

6. The end of military operations in northern and eastern Sri Lanka is an opportunity to rebuild the country after the ravages of conflict. In the immediate post-conflict situation, the most pressing concern is to ensure the early resettlement and rehabilitation of the nearly three lakh Tamil civilians displaced by the conflict in the last year. The early return of the Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs) to their homes is a crucial first step towards reclaiming their lives and restoring normalcy. We have been assured by the Sri Lankan Government and President of their intention to proceed quickly with the task of resettlement. Mr. Basil Rajapaksa, Senior Adviser to the President of Sri Lanka, led a high-level delegation to India on June 24, 2009 when we studied the resettlement and rehabilitation issue in great detail. The Sri Lankan Government have committed themselves to resettling most IDPs in 180 days.

7. India will provide every possible assistance in the task of rehabilitation, resettlement and reconstruction. Hon'ble Members will recall that Prime Minister himself announced in this august House, India's firm commitment to engage with the process of relief and rehabilitation in Sri Lanka in keeping with our abiding interest in the well being of the Tamil people in that country. The Government has earmarked Rs. 500 crores for this purpose and we are willing to do more.

8. The immediate focus of the projects that will be taken up as part of this effort include deployment of four demining teams, which is a prerequisite for IDPs to return to their homes, reconstruction of houses and supply of shelter material, medical assistance, and provision and repair of civil infrastructure.

9. Since November 2008, India has shipped 1.7 lakh family relief packs from Tamil Nadu for IDPs and civilians affected by the conflict. The packs included essential items such as dry rations, personal hygiene items, clothes, utensils etc. and were distributed to the beneficiaries by the ICRC. Another consignment of family packs will be dispatched from Tamil Nadu shortly. India has also been operating a full-fledged 60-member field hospital in Sri Lanka since March 2009. Since moving to its new location near Vavuniya after the end of military operations, more than 14,000 patients have been treated by the facility which is equipped with modern equipment and amenities and they have done commendable work. Further, two consignments of medicines have also been gifted to Sri Lanka in view of the urgent requirement for civilians and IDPs.

10. The cessation of hostilities gives Sri Lanka an opportunity to make a new beginning and to build a better future for all her peoples and, therefore, for the region as a whole. We are convinced that a closure to the cycle of violence and terrorism that has plagued Sri Lanka requires an inclusive political process of dialogue and devolution. Such a process must address the legitimate aspirations of the minorities, including the Tamil community, within the democratic framework of a united Sri Lanka.

11. We have been assured by the Sri Lankan Government of their intention to pursue a political process that envisages a broader dialogue with all parties including the Tamil parties, the full implementation of the 13th Amendment to the Sri Lankan Constitution and to go beyond, so as to achieve meaningful devolution of powers. We will remain engaged with them through this process.

12. I would also like to take this opportunity to mention that the Government continues to closely monitor incidents affecting the safety of our fishermen in the waters between India and Sri Lanka. We have reiterated to Sri Lanka the need to ensure strict compliance with the understanding on fishing arrangements reached between the two countries in October 2008.

13. As a close neighbour with whom our security and prosperity are inescapably intertwined, the Government attaches utmost importance to the future course of events in Sri Lanka and has an interest in ensuring that a lasting political settlement is reached.

Nepal

14. Finally, I wish to inform the House of recent developments in Nepal. As Hon'ble Members are aware, the peace process in Nepal after the Constituent Assembly elections last year has gone through many ups and downs.

15. Due to the nature of our relations and the open border, developments in Nepal have a direct impact on us. We are therefore concerned at the lack of progress on peace process issues and fraying of the political consensus that was critical to the peace process. The task of constitution making has also not progressed as per agreed schedule, and it remains to be seen whether it can be completed by the stipulated timeframe of April 2010.

16. There are also significant differences between political parties as to the structure of governance, issues like federalism etc., which they need to resolve. The Army Integration Special Committee, with the mandate to supervise, integrate and rehabilitate the combatants of the Maoist Army, was constituted in January 2009 along with a Technical Committee. No tangible progress has been achieved by it on the issue, too. Over 19,600 combatants of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) of the Maoists and over 4000 cadres disqualified by the UN Mission in Nepal (UNMIN), which include minors, continue to stay in cantonments with their upkeep paid for by the Government of Nepal and international donors.

17. Prime Minister Prachanda resigned on May 4, 2009, after a political crisis brought about by his insistence on removal of the Chief of Army Staff of Nepal Army in spite of opposition from major political parties, including the main coalition partner CPN-UML, and advice of the President.

18. Following his resignation, a new coalition Government has been formed under the leadership of Prime Minister Madhav Kumar Nepal of CPN-UML. The coalition Government is supported by 22 political parties and enjoys a majority in the 601 member Constituent Assembly, which also acts as Legislature-Parliament.

19. On her part, India has provided full support to the ongoing peace process in Nepal, including material assistance to strengthen the civil security forces and law enforcement machinery, and support for elections to the Constituent Assembly. We hope that the new government would be able to move expeditiously on the tasks of constitution making and conclusion of peace process on the basis of widest possible consensus. We have conveyed our commitment to assist the Government and people of Nepal in their endeavour of transition to multi-party democracy and conclusion of peace process, in any manner and to the extent Nepal would like us to.

20. The open border between India and Nepal offers opportunities, as well as challenges. Recently, there were allegations in the Nepalese media of encroachments on the border by Sashastra Seema Bal (SSB), which were found to be false. Strip maps covering about ninety six percent of the India-Nepal boundary have been jointly finalized and initialed. We have also agreed to establish local level mechanisms across the border to address issues related to border management.

21. Closure of the breach in the embankment of the Kosi river that occurred in August 2008 in Nepal has been carried out. We are also carrying out additional anti-erosion and protection works.

22. Our relations with Nepal are unique, and will continue to be a matter of highest priority for India. We do not view our fraternal ties with Nepal through the prism of its relations with any other country. A peaceful democratic Nepal is in the interest of the people of Nepal, of India and of our region. India will continue to support Nepal in its democratic transition and economic development in any manner and to the extent it would like us to.

23. Thank you!

035. Address by Minister of State Dr Shashi Tharoor at the inauguration of Fifth Ministerial Conference of the Community of Democracies.

Lisbon, July 12, 2009.

H.E. Mr Jaime Gama, President of the Assembly of the Republic of Portugal,

H.E. Mr Luis Amado, Foreign Minister of Portugal,

Honourable Ministers in the podium and in the hall,

Excellencies, Distinguished Guests, especially our "matriarch" Secretary Madeline Albright,

Ladies and Gentlemen.

I would like to begin by congratulating our hosts, His Excellency the President of the Parliament and His Excellency the Foreign Minister and their staffs for the excellent arrangements made to host this major Ministerial meeting and for the warm hospitality of the Government of Portugal.

2. It is a particular pleasure to address this Inaugural Ceremony. India's is a culture which values modesty in conduct and speech, but one boast we have not been shy of making is that we are proud of being the world's largest democracy. It is India's conviction, from its experience in maintaining this distinction, that democracy is the only form of governance that gives each citizen of a country a strong sense that her destiny and that of her nation is determined only with full respect for her own wishes.

3. India is also proud of being able to demonstrate, in a world riven by ethnic conflict and notions of clashing civilizations, that democracy is not only compatible with diversity, but preserves and protects it. No other country in the world, after all, embraces the extraordinary mixture of ethnic groups, the profusion of mutually incomprehensible languages, the varieties of topography and climate, the diversity of religions and cultural practices, and the range of levels of economic development that India does. Yet Indian democracy, rooted in the constitutional rule of law and free elections, has managed the processes of political change and economic transformation necessary to develop our country.

4. India is united not by a common ethnicity, language, or religion, but by the experience of a common history within a shared geographical space, reified in a liberal constitution and the repeated exercise of democratic self-governance in a pluralist polity. India's founding fathers wrote a constitution for this dream; we in India have given passports to their ideals. Instead of what is sometimes known as the "narcissism of minor differences," in India we celebrate the commonality of major differences. To stand the famous phrase on its head, India is a land of belonging rather than of blood.

5. So the idea of India is of one land embracing many. It is the idea that a nation may endure differences of caste, creed, colour, culture, conviction, cuisine, costume, and custom, and still rally around a democratic consensus. That consensus is about the simple principle that in a democracy you do not really need to agree all the time- except on the ground rules of how you will disagree. Indians are comfortable with the idea of multiple identities and multiple loyalties, all coming together in allegiance to a larger idea of India.

6. In my country, the largest electoral exercise in the history of humanity, the 15th General Election for our Parliament, was completed on May 16, 2009. It was a mammoth election, with over 460 million voters, out of 734 million eligible to do so, casting their votes in 830,000 polling booths over a period of four weeks. Though as a victor myself, I can celebrate the results, I can say with great pride and satisfaction that the exercise itself, and not just the outcome, demonstrated the vital strength of democracy. As President Gama said today, democracy is also about how to lose, and that is something Indians have repeatedly learned, as multiple changes of governments have confirmed. Democracy is a process and not just an event; it is the product of the exchange of hopes and promises, commitments and compromises which underpins the sacred compact between governments and the governed that we are all here to uphold.

Mr. Chairman

7. As we approach the 10th Anniversary of the Community of Democracies, I must compliment member countries and the civil society organizations present for their abiding interest and commitment to the principles of our Community. Since the first meeting in Warsaw in 2000, our Community has grown in strength. The principles enshrined in the Warsaw declaration, the Seoul Plan of action, the Santiago commitment and the Bamako consensus are a reaffirmation of our democratic ideals and values.

Mr. Chairman

8. Several challenges have emerged or been reinforced in the last decade that have a bearing on democracy. I would like briefly to touch upon three of them.

9. The first challenge, also evoked by the foreign ministers of Mali and Brazil, is the international financial crisis and the danger that poses to the fulfillment of the Millennium Development Goals, the MDGs.

10. Two reports were recently issued at the United Nations. The first was an Outcome Document of the high level General Assembly Summit on the Global Financial Crisis. The second was a report launched at the margins of the UN- ECOSOC high level segment meeting in Geneva earlier this month. Both have sharply underscored the serious negative impact of the financial crisis, also vividly described today by the foreign minister of the Republic of Korea. The second report indelibly and starkly brings out the clear signs of regression in regard to the MDGs as a result of the global financial crisis. In 2009, it states that an estimated 90 million more people will be living in extreme poverty than was anticipated before the crisis. In fact, before the crisis the number of people living on less than $ 1.25 a day was showing a downward trend.

11. In India we are conscious of the huge challenge of poverty alleviation and of the impact of the financial crisis. We have weathered the initial phase of the crisis ourselves due to our strong institutions. Our banks are well regulated, capitalized, and resourced. We have taken steps to maintain an adequate liquidity position while ensuring that delivery of credit remains on track. India's public spending has been enhanced significantly. These measures have helped India to maintain an estimated 7% rate of growth despite the current crisis.

12. But we are conscious that many other democracies could be vulnerable to the societal pressures arising from the economic setbacks caused by the global financial crisis. This is a time for solidarity amongst democracies, developed and developing.

13. Which leads us to our second challenge. Democratic governance is imperative not only at the national level but equally at the international level. We are a community of nations which believes and practices democratic governance at home. We are unified in these values. However, in the larger international arena, the governance relationship between developed and developing countries remains skewed. The global governance architecture has elements of non-inclusiveness and less than fully participatory institutions. Such a democracy deficit is visible in almost every multilateral institution, including in the United Nations. This is why India and other countries present here have called for urgent reform of the United Nations, including in the Security Council. Reform of the international financial architecture is also an immediate imperative. We hope that our common ideals of democratic inclusiveness and a level playing field will guide members of this community in supporting reform of the international governance system.

14. Third: Terrorism is a serious threat to democracy. I need not dwell on this subject at this forum, since all of us know that terrorism and those who practice terror have scant respect for democratic values, norms, institutions or governance. In fact, the very fabric of democracy is a target for the merchants of terror. Pluralism, diversity, human rights and freedoms are anathema to the agents of hatred and fanaticism. As a Community of Democracies we must stand boldly against terrorism and its perpetrators. Terrorism is, after all, an assault on the common bonds of humanity and civility that tie us all together. Our commitment to democracy should make us stronger in the face of terror and we should not relent till this scourge is extinguished effectively. A united and universal response is needed, which is why we should cooperate to adopt international agreements against terror, notably the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism which has been pending for the last eight years. On the broader issue of promoting understanding across Cultures, I am pleased to see President Jorge Sampaio here on behalf of the 'Alliance of Civilizations', a cause my government strongly supports.

Mr. Chairman

15. I have spoken of a few major challenges that face democracies today. What can and should be done to face them would be part of the debate in the three round table thematic sessions today. I look forward to hearing your ideas and approaches in addressing these and other challenges.

16. As we embark on our deliberations today, I would like to thank the current Chair, Portugal, for its leadership in the Community of Democracies, and to welcome Lithuania as the incoming Chair. Let me also take this opportunity to reaffirm India's commitment to work with our partners in the Community of Democracies. Let us cherish and value what we have in common as democracies, but let us also respect what makes us different from each other, and appreciate that it is in the nature of democracies to be responsive to the very different preoccupations of their own internal constituencies. The last century has, despite many horrors along the way, given us, in the famous phrase, a "world safe for democracy". Let us also work, in the 21st century, to establish a world safe for diversity.

Thank you.

036. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the visit of Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor to Lisbon for attending the 5th Ministerial Conference of the Community of Democracies.

New Delhi, July 13, 2009.

Minister of State for External Affairs Dr. Shashi Tharoor attended the 5th Ministerial Conference of the Community of Democracies (CoD) in Lisbon on July 11-12, 2009. The Minister of State spoke at the inaugural session along with the Foreign Ministers of Mali, Brazil, the Republic of Korea and the US Deputy Secretary of State which was chaired by Foreign Minister Luis Amado of Portugal and opened by Speaker of the Portuguese Parliament. The two day conference commenced with a workshop with civil society on Democratic Governance and Inter cultural Dialogue and held three thematic sessions on "Implications of the Current Financial and Economic Crisis in Democratic Governance, Democratic Governance and Development and Future Challenges for the Community of Democracies".

On the sidelines of the conference the Minister of State met and exchanged views with other Ministers present including Celso Amorim, Foreign Minister of Brazil; Dipu Moni, Foreign Minister of Bangladesh; Radoslaw Sikorski, Foreign Minister of Poland; Ebrahim Ismail Ebrahim, Deputy Foreign Minister of South Africa; Minister Sujata Koirala of Nepal; Moctar Ouane, Foreign Minister of Mali; James Steinberg, US Deputy Secretary of State and Portuguese Deputy Minister Joao Cravinho. He also met Jorge Sampaio, former President of Portugal and High Representative of the Alliance of Civilizations and Madeleine Albright, former US Secretary of State, who was instrumental in the formation of the CoD in 2000.

India is a member of the Convening Group of the CoD, a forum of democratic countries involved in an ongoing dialogue among countries wedded to and practicing democracy. Its objective is to promote strengthening of the democratic form of governance throughout the world. Portugal as the present Chair of the Group hosted the 5th Ministerial CoD. Earlier Ministerials have been held in Warsaw in 2000, in Seoul in 2002, in Santiago, Chile in 2005 and in Bamako, Mali in 2007. The next ministerial will be held in Lithuania which has taken over the Chairmanship of the CoD. Lithuania will be followed by Mongolia. The 10th Anniversary of the founding of the CoD will be held in Poland in 2010. Representatives from over 100 countries attended the meeting in addition to some 80 non-governmental organizations.

0037. Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at All India Annual Conference for Haj 2009.

New Delhi, July 14, 2009.

Mr. Hasan Ahmed, Vice-Chairman and Members of Haj Committee of India,

Shri N. Ravi, Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs

Shri M.OH. Farook, Ambassador of India to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia

Honorable Members of Parliament,

Shri Mohammed Owais, CEO, Haj Committee of India,

Chairmen and Members of the State Haj Committees, former Chairman
Shri Iqbal Ahmed Saradgi,

Distinguished Religious Scholars,

Members of the Media and

Dear Brothers & Sisters,

It is my great pleasure and privilege to welcome you to the All India Annual Conference for Haj 2009. It's a matter of personal satisfaction for me to be associated for the first time with Haj arrangements of the Indian pilgrims from this year as Minister of State for External Affairs, in-charge of Haj matters.

I would also take this opportunity to congratulate all the agencies involved in the Haj management i.e. Ministry of External Affairs, Ministry of Civil Aviation, the Haj Committee of India, State Haj Committees, Air India, Indian Airlines, Consulate General of India in Jeddah and others for the successful completion of the Haj 2008.

On behalf of all pilgrims from India, we have requested and would again urge His Majesty King Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz Al-Saud, Custodian of the two Holy Mosques, not only to maintain the same quota as last year, but also increase it, so that more Indian pilgrims who desire to perform Haj could do so without any hindrance. We have been assured of positive consideration, but are awaiting a response. We thank and felicitate the Saudi Government whose hospitality and arrangement year after year, have become more extensive and pilgrim-friendly.

Dear Friends, the Annual Haj Conference is an institutionalized platform for all stakeholders in the Haj, including the political leadership, the Haj

Committees, the Government departments including the Consulate General of India, Jeddah, the Ministry of Civil Aviation, Air India, Members of Parliament and, of course, learned religious scholars to air their views through transparent discussions, frank exchange of opinions and brainstorming on all Haj-related matters. The deliberations in this forum have brought to the forefront many useful suggestions and ideas in the past, I am told, which had enabled the Government to further improve and strengthen the overall arrangements of the Haj.

Mr. Hasan Ahmed has already started the ball rolling. We have already taken note of them and I want to assure you that we would seriously consider the suggestions and recommendations. I would like to urge various States to depute sufficient number of Khadimul Hujjaj and to give them proper orientation so that they can be of use to the pilgrims. These Khadimul Hujjaj are supplemented and supported by community volunteers mobilized by the Consulate General of India hailing from different parts of India. Some States have not taken a proactive role in sending the Khadimul Hujjaj that tends to put further strain on the limited human resources available to us in Jeddah. I would, therefore, urge all State Haj Committees to make every possible effort so that Hajjis from their States could be further assisted during the Haj.

This year we have had a particularly challenging task as the Saudi Government wanted us to comply with the requirement of travel by Hajjis only on international passports. I am happy to inform you that this challenge is being successfully met with the cooperation of Ministries, the Regional Passport Offices, Central and State Haj Committees. If any difficulties are being faced, these should be addressed to the Gulf & CPV Divisions of the Ministry of External Affairs. I would also be happy to intervene, if necessary, so that no pilgrim is inconvenienced.

The Government has also taken a number of decisions to streamline the functioning of Private Tour Operators so that they can provide proper services and facilities for the pilgrims. It is a matter of satisfaction that over the years the Indian Private Tour Operators have been contributing significantly in providing necessary services to the Indian pilgrims. These pilgrims also benefit from the arrangements, for medical and general assistance, put in place by the Haj Mission in Jeddah.

I know it is the cherished desire of every Muslim brother and sister to perform Haj. However, as a result of the incidence of some communicable diseases like Swine-flu, the Saudi authorities have been advising the elderly, the pregnant women and children to refrain from undertaking the Haj this year. This is not mandatory but I would request you to at least inform our pilgrims of the inherent health risks, and take suitable precautions. In any case, we must ensure that all pilgrims are properly inoculated with all prescribed vaccines including H1N1 (Swine Flu). I could suggest that Hajis would need to be medically screened at embarkation points to avoid their being quarantined on arrival.

I would also like to request the Haj Committee of India and the State Haj Committees and all others who are concerned with Haj affairs to give the highest priority to the pre-departure counselling and orientation of the prospective Haj pilgrims so that they embark on their journey of a lifetime with greater confidence and perform their rituals in a safe and spiritually satisfying manner. I am happy to note that tomorrow and the day after, the first such training sessions are being started.

Although I am a new Member of Parliament and Minister, and have not yet visited Saudi Arabia in either capacity (I have visited privately for 1 day this year), I do look forward to my visit to interact with Saudi authorities especially His Excellency the Haj Minister and other senior dignitaries, who are committed to this holy task.

The Government and the Haj Committee of India constantly strive to make the Haj affordable and comfortable. While all possible measures are taken to cater to the diverse requirements of all our Haj pilgrims, considering the magnitude of the logistics of movement, accommodation and air transport, it is not always easy to satisfy all the pilgrims. I would, therefore, request the pilgrims to show patience and understanding. I do, of course, appreciate that most of the pilgrims have been cooperative and appreciative of the government authorities.

I would request all the participants at this conference to air their valuable views and suggestions so that useful policy decisions could be taken up as a follow-up to this Conference.

I thank all of you for your gracious presence and extend my best wishes for a very successful All India Haj Conference, and consequently a most rewarding experience to all our Haj pilgrims.

038. Keynote Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the 18th AMIC Annual Conference on the subject of "Media, Democracy and Governance: Emerging Paradigms in a Digital Age".

New Delhi, July 16, 2009.

Chair of the session H.E Dr Abdul Waheed Khan, Assistant Director General of UNESCO,

Prof Binod Agrawal, Vice Chancellor, Himgiri Nabh Vishwavidyalaya

Dr Ang Peng Hwa, Chairman, AMIC

Dr Indrajit Banerjee, Secretary-General, AMIC

Distinguished experts and guests,

Representatives of media both from India and abroad,

Ladies and Gentlemen, Friends I hope that covers everyone

It is indeed a great honour for me to be here with you this afternoon. I would like to thank the Asian Media Information and Communication Centre, AMIC, for extending the invitation to me and bestowing on me the honour to speak to this distinguished gathering. I would like to compliment AMIC, Professor Ang Peng Hwa and in particular my friend Dr. Indrajit Banerjee on organizing this Conference in New Delhi on a very topical issue. On what we all know is a valedictory occasion for Indrajit, I would like to take this opportunity to warmly felicitate and compliment your outgoing Secretary-General for his enthusiasm, his dynamism and his commitment to the cause of Media and Communications in Asia. The AMIC we see today in many ways bears his personal stamp. I know I speak for you all when I wish him well in his new career at UNESCO.

2. I have been very impressed by the array of speakers and participants at this Conference. I am confident that the various plenary and parallel sessions of the Conference over the last few days have produced papers and discussions with rich substance and high relevance on topics of interest to academics and practitioners alike - including media and democracy, media and gender, media and cultural identity, and current trends in the international media industry. I am sure that the Conference has also provided a valuable opportunity for all of you to interact informally.

Mr. Chairman,

3. I am conscious that I am addressing you as your Conference draws to a close on its fourth day today. I would have personally much preferred to learn from the renowned experts representing a multitude of disciplines gathered here rather than inflict another lecture on you. Unfortunately the tyranny of my schedule did not permit me to listen to you all and I am therefore speaking without the benefit of having heard the learned views of some of the best known experts and professionals in the spheres of media, government and development. I feel rather like a fisherman rising to deliver a lecture on the whale and discovering that Jonah is in the audience - and what's more, has already spoken! I know there are many Jonahs in this audience and I apologize to them in advance.

4. But now to say that media occupy a significant place in our lives, especially in a democracy, would be an understatement. Many of us are aware of Thomas Carlyle's reference to Edmund Burke turning his head to the press gallery in Parliament and saying: "...in the Reporters' Gallery yonder, there sat a Fourth Estate more important [by] far than they all." And the "they all" stood for the other three Estates! If media commanded that level of prominence when Edmund Burke spoke of it in the 18th century - when the wheels of the industrial revolution had just turned and when there was no television, no internet, no twitter, neither landlines nor mobile phones, and when the total circulation of newspapers in Britain, printed probably only in one language, would have been insignificant compared to today's - then one can well imagine the impact media has in our lives now when large chunks of the human population are literally just a click away from one another. Any doubt that I might have had about the reach and influence of global mass communications was dispelled for years ago in my UN days when I happened to be in St. Petersburg, Russia, for a conference and was approached by a Tibetan Buddhist monk in his saffron robes, thumping a cymbal and chanting his mantras, who paused in his chanting to say: "I've seen you on BBC!" New communications technology has clearly shrunk the world, and in the real sense made it all one.

5. The most significant aspect of the media from the point of view of the subject of this Conference is its relation with, and contribution to, democracy. Simply put, democracy is impossible without free media. Press freedom is both the mortar that binds together the bricks of democracy and it's also an open window embedded in those bricks. Democracy and free media constitute two sides of the same coin. It is this centrality which led Thomas Jefferson to say famously, and I quote: "Were it left to me to decide whether we should have a government without newspapers or newspapers without government, I should not hesitate to prefer the latter." Unquote. I am not sure how solidly I agree with that, but

6. This Jeffersonian view of the criticality of free media for the existence of democracy is something India can attest to from our experience. Our national movement, our freedom struggle, itself saw several publications, such as Mahatma Gandhi's Young India and Harijan, and the Jugantar of Shri Aurobindo, inspiring millions to join the struggle for independence. Moreover, these and other similar publications inculcated and fostered the democratic values and principles which independent India has come to champion. It is on this foundation which rests the edifice of the freedom of expression, guaranteed as a fundamental right in our Constitution, and zealously protected by its practitioners and guardians.

7. The idea of freedom of expression, which includes freedom of press and other media, did not come to us in India as a mere import from the West. Freedom of expression had been integral to Indian civilization and to the ever ongoing synthesis amongst its various traditions. Our Constitution codified what had been the essence of the Indian civilization: the freedom to express life in all its diverse manifestations. Diversity is central to the Indian experience; and diversity cannot be preserved without the freedom to say this is who we are, this is what matters to us, this is what we want to be. Freedom of expression and therefore of media is therefore fundamental to India's constitutional democracy.

Mr. Chairman,

8. It is the diversity of India which expresses itself through an almost mind-boggling array of publications and audio-visual media today. In independent India, the soil has been fertile and the climate propitious for the media to play a key role in nurturing and buttressing both democracy and development, and at the same time to bloom in the form of more than a thousand flowers. At a time when media around the world is in a state of contraction amidst the financial crisis, India is a rare exception where all forms of media are growing. Newspapers are fading in the West but flourishing in India; television and radio are extending their broadcast reach; and the internet is slowly penetrating a growing percentage of Indian households. Today, more than 65,000 newspapers and periodicals are registered for publication in 123 languages and dialects. The total circulation of just about 8,500 of the largest of these 65,000 was more than 180 million.

There are some states (such as Orissa and Maharashtra) which publish newspapers in more than one dozen of the twenty two languages listed in the Eight Schedule of the Constitution. While there are more than one hundred private TV channels, the widest reach is with Doordarshan, which has five national and eleven regional language channels. Now, in 1947, when we won our independence All India Radio, or AIR, had six stations covering 2.5% of the country's area and 11% of its population. Today, it has 225 broadcast centres covering over 99% of the population through its programmes in 22 Indian languages. And its broadcasts also reach over 100 countries in 15 foreign languages.

9. Now, while these numbers give some indication of the high status and prominence enjoyed by media in Indian democracy, the real and full facts of its centrality lie behind these figures. Many of you are familiar with the metaphor of the media as the canary in the mine-shaft - the bird lowered into the depths to test the levels of oxygen at the bottom of the coalmine. Our canary continues to breathe and even to sing, so perhaps I could instead use a different medical metaphor. We in India have seen media, in different contexts, as a doctor's mirror in which the patient sees a reflection of reality; as a diagnostic tool - a sort of MRI scan which, in the hands of an expert professional, has the potential to lay bare a hidden problem; and also, occasionally, as a scalpel - as if the radiologist sometimes decides to assume the role of a surgeon as well.

10. Apart from being a watchdog of public interest, the media acts as a two-way conduit between the people and those who have the responsibility for their governance and development. This is, arguably, the most important role of one media in a democratic developing country like ours. Media keeps the citizens engaged in governance by disseminating information, educating and mobilizing public opinion, and thus facilitating the active participation of citizens in democracy. But it should be remembered that media does not just reflect public opinion, it shapes it. When the media is engaged, the public is engaged. The media shapes our awareness of events and, by so doing, sometimes shapes events themselves. Events that the media ignores find it difficult to obtain traction in the modern world; events that the media focuses on, on the other hand, become impossible even for powerful Governments to ignore.

11. A complementary role of media is to act as a channel for feedback or information for the policy makers and administrators on the need for action in a particular sphere. To borrow the term used by our great Nobel laureate Prof Amartya Sen, the media acts as "the best early warning system" bringing out information that can have a significant impact on policies and programmes. "Information and critical public discussion are an inescapably important requirement of good public policy," he writes. It is this role of the media which has made government more responsive and accountable in many countries and I am proud to say in my own. While free media is essential for all countries, we in India think it is even more important in developing countries because the challenge of development requires challenges from the public through the media. In India, the persistence of an inquisitive press has also made public servants more accustomed, and more open, to their presence, thereby promoting the notion of a partnership for the greater common good.

12. Press freedom is also a precondition for economic and social progress. Many of you are familiar with Amartya Sen's famous argument that there has never been a famine in a democracy with a free press. Famines are the result of a lack of access to food, and Sen has proved, with extensive research, that they occur only when the media is not free to draw attention to the problem. Press freedom is also essential to generating awareness about development, about the environment, about education and about critical health issues like HIV/AIDS. And it continues to be a major building block in constructing governance that is people-centered, inclusive and progressive.

13. The new hallmarks of development are the ability to receive, download and send information through electronic networks, and the capacity to share information - including not only newspapers and journals, but also on-line web sites - without restriction. This is why censorship is so unwise; indeed, it is anti-development. For developing countries need to open up to the outside world, liberalize their mass media, and resist government control and censorship of information, if they are to be able to take advantage of the opportunities that the information revolution has made available to the world.

14. A corollary to the media's role in good governance is its advocacy of inclusiveness. The media has and usually discharges the responsibility to bring the marginalized and the issues of their concern into the mainstream of public debate. A byproduct of this focus is the role media can and do perform in either building or promoting a consensus on key social and economic issues, or in highlighting a basic common denominator, where there is discord and conflict.

15. Now, so far I have been speaking about the news media. But even entertainment television educates people - children and adults - through the values it espouses in its popular shows. Television entertainment teaches about culture, about society, about history, about interpersonal relationships. It helps a society define itself.

16. It may surprise some that I speak of mass entertainment television as an educational medium. Groucho Marx once said that he found television enormously educational, because whenever anyone turned on a TV set, he went into another room and read a book. Now, doubtless there are people who imagine that educational entertainment television is an oxymoron. I suspect these are the same people who say that the reason television is called a medium is because it is neither rare nor well done.

17. And yet there is no escaping television's reach and influence in every democracy. The question isn't whether TV teaches, it's what it teaches. Media can reinforce existing stereotypes, or build new positive ones. You can denigrate and dismiss cultures that are different from the mainstream. Or it can celebrate diversity.

18. To the broadcasters in this room, let me say this: As the custodians of the airwaves, you can choose to be purveyors of weapons of mass distraction. Or you can choose to be builders of a better world.

Mr. Chairman,

19. Our topic speaks of the media, democracy and governance in a digital age, and I haven't yet mentioned the Internet. There is no doubt that the internet can be a democratizing tool. In some parts of the world, certainly in most of the West, it has already become one, since large amounts of information are now accessible to almost anyone.

20. But a person's means of access to information has long served as a way by which you could determine his or her wealth - perhaps merely by glancing at the watch on their wrist. That is a source of information about a person. And the stark reality of the world today is that you can tell the rich from the poor by their Internet connections.

21. Today, the poverty line is linked to the high-speed digital line, the fibre optic line.... all the lines that exclude those who are literally not plugged in to the possibilities of our new world. There is a marked gap between the technological haves and have-nots - between those who know, and those who don't - both between cultures and within them. This gap has come to be called the digital divide.

22. To put it simply, thus far, the information revolution, unlike the French Revolution, is a revolution with a lot of liberty, some fraternity, and no equality.

23. I am sure that in the deliberations over the last four days, the distinguished participants in this Conference have discussed and delineated the contours of the emerging paradigms relating to media, democracy and governance. As a person associated with governance, and often coming into interaction with media, may I say that the role of media in democracy and development, which I have briefly touched upon, leads me to surmise that it is the common man, the aam aadmi, as my Party likes to call them who holds the touchstone for the relevance, correctness and utility of any evolving paradigm in this area. Success of media both as a commercial venture and as a tool capable of moulding public discourse and policies, in my view, hinges and will continue to hinge on how it touches the life of the aam aadmi, the common man.

24. It is this belief, which brings me, Mr. Chairman, to the last of the points I wanted to make. I am sure the Conference has already addressed and discussed issues such as the inclusiveness issue implications of the competitive market and excessive commercialization on the quality and type of content and focus of media. This is particularly relevant for audio-visual media, which has real time reach. It may be due to this that all the time something is "breaking" on the airwaves in my country (in the form of 'breaking news'), turn on the TV in India you cannot go 5 mins. without seeing something 'breaking', making us almost believe that something earth-shattering is happening somewhere all the time. All too often, the sensational prevails over the substantial; after all, in the US, it is said, "if it bleeds, its leads". But we have to pause and ask: Does so much focus on 'breaking' leave enough space for 'constructing' through deeper and wider coverage and analysis? What serves the aam admi better: bits of information which may not be relevant or retainable the minute after, or a full picture on the issues of his concern? Should dramatizing or "dumbing down" the news in a quest for ratings points carry a premium over serious reporting? Should tight purses, particularly in difficult economic times, necessarily lead to "infotainment", driving a shift in the focus away from what matters to the common man? Is there a danger that the media, in its quest to attract eyeballs, can drive public policy in a dangerous direction, for instance by stoking national chauvinism or jingoism on international questions where a more measured approach might be wiser? Or is there a middle ground, a way out, perhaps a harder way?

Ladies and Gentlemen,

25. Like all good and important questions, these may not have simple and straightforward answers and I am not going to venture any to you today. I would merely point out what India's first Prime Minister Pandit Nehru had said, and I quote, "Freedom brings responsibilities...and we have to face them in the spirit of a free and disciplined people." Unquote. I am sure that the Conference has discussed such issues. I am also hopeful that the deliberations of the Conference will point to the best possible answers. Meanwhile, let me reiterate that democracy, development and government on one hand and the media on the other continue to benefit in India from their symbiotic relationship. On our part, we in the government are committed to upholding the highest ideals and guarantees of freedom of expression that our Constitution enshrines.

Mr. Chairman,

26. The prospective benefits of the information age are clear; in a nutshell, we now have a powerful tool to address the disadvantages of under-development, of isolation, of poverty and of the lack of political accountability and political freedom.

27. But these benefits will only be made manifest when the entrances and exits to the digital information superhighway are open to everyone, when they are mapped and signposted in such a way as to allow everyone to know where they need to go, and when the road itself is suitable for all manner of vehicles, from sports cars to trams, and from rickshaws to bicycles. Access to information, in other words, is of paramount importance in a democracy.

28. Pandit Nehru had once said, "We live in a wonderful world that is full of beauty, charm and adventure. There is no end to the adventures that we can have if only we seek them with our eyes open." Unquote. I would wish and pray that media remain our eyes for leading us from falsehood to truth, and from darkness to light - asato ma sadgamay, tamaso ma jyotirgamaya. After all the human mind is like a parachute - it functions effectively only when it is open.

29. So with these parting words, I would like to once again thank the Asian Media Information and Communication Centre for giving me the honour and privilege of speak in this distinguished gathering today. And I hope you have all had a wonderful Conference.

I thank you all for your attention.

Thank you.

039. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in the Rajya Sabha on his visit to Italy, France and Egypt.

New Delhi, July 17, 2009.

Mr. Deputy Chairman, Sir, I returned earlier today from visits to France and Egypt. Before that I had visited Italy for the G-8/G-5 Summit meetings. Meetings of the G-8 and G-5 countries have become an annual feature. The agenda for this year's meetings was wide ranging, but the main focus was on the ongoing global economic and financial slowdown. The developing countries have been the most affected by the global financial and economic crisis. I stressed the importance of a concerted and well-coordinated global response to address systemic failures and to stimulate the real economy. There is a need to maintain adequate flow of finance to the developing countries and to keep markets open by resisting protectionist pressures.

As a responsible member of the international community, I conveyed to the G-8 and G-5 countries that we recognise our obligation to preserve and protect our environment but climate change cannot be addressed by perpetuating the poverty of the developing countries. I presented India's Action Plan on Climate Change and the eight National Missions which we have set up in this regard. We are willing to do more provided there are credible arrangements to provide both additional financial support as well as technological transfers from developed to developing countries.

India's participation as guest of honour at the French National Day was an honour and a matter of pride for us all. I wish to share with the hon. Members the pride I felt to see the brave men of our Armed Forces from all three services leading the French National Day parade. We have a strategic partnership with France. In this spirit, in our discussions, President Sarkozy and I reviewed the entire range of our bilateral cooperation including counter-terrorism and defence cooperation. President Sarkozy was categorical in asserting that France is ready for full civilian nuclear cooperation with India.

In Egypt, I participated in the 15th Summit of the Non-Aligned Movement. NAM is the powerful voice of almost two-third of the world's nations. I recalled what Pandit Nehru had said about NAM being a moral force in global affairs. The Summit called for bringing decision-making processes in the international system, including the UN and international financial institutions, in tune with contemporary realities. I am glad that our views found widespread resonance and that the Summit heeded our call to strongly condemn international terrorism.

On the sidelines of the Summit, I met with the Presidents of Egypt, Sri Lanka, Vietnam and the Palestinian National Authority, and the Prime Minister of Bangladesh, Malaysia, Nepal and Pakistan. I found a uniform desire among all these countries to further enhance their relations with India.

During my meeting with Prime Minister Gilani of Pakistan yesterday, we discussed the present condition of India-Pakistan relations, its future potential and the steps that are necessary to enable us to realise the potential. I conveyed to him the strong sentiments of the people of India over the issue of terrorism, especially the terrorist attacks in Mumbai.

We are reviewing the dossier of investigations into these attacks which Pakistan has provided to us. I also conveyed to Prime Minister Gilani that sustained, effective and credible action needs to be taken not only to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attack to justice, but also to shut down the operations of terrorist groups so as to prevent any future attacks. It has been and remains our consistent position that the starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is a fulfilment of their commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India. Prime Minister Gilani assured me that Pakistan will do everything in its power to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attacks to justice. He also told me that there is consensus in Pakistan against the activities of these terrorist groups, that strong action is being taken and that this is in Pakistan's own interest. The distinguished parliamentarians from different parties who accompanied the Pakistan Prime Minister also said to me that there was political consensus in Pakistan on this issue.

As the Joint Statement says, action on terrorism should not be linked to the composite dialogue process, and, therefore, cannot await other developments. It was agreed that the two countries will share real time, credible and actionable information on any future terrorist threats. Whether, when and in what form we broaden the dialogue with Pakistan will depend on future developments. For the present, we have agreed that the Foreign Secretaries will meet as often as necessary and report to the two Foreign Ministers who will meet on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly.

As I have said before in this House, India seeks cooperative relations with Pakistan, and engagement is the only way forward to realise the vision of a stable and prosperous South Asia living in peace and amity. We are willing to go more than half way provided Pakistan creates the conditions for a meaningful dialogue. I hope that there is forward movement in the coming months.

I have returned home convinced that these interactions with world leaders have served to further advance India's interests.

Shri Arun Jaitley (The Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Deputy Chairman, Sir, I am sure the Prime Minister on both his visits had a very fruitful discussion with various heads of Government and the multilateral meetings that he attended. I note that in the Statement of the Prime Minister which was made in the House today, the hon. Prime Minister has said and I am just quoting two sentences from the statement, "I also conveyed to Prime Minister Gilani that sustained, effective and credible action needs to be taken not only to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attack to justice, but also to shut down the operations of terrorist groups so as to prevent any future attacks."

The Prime Minister correctly notes, and I say correctly notes, "it has been and remains our consistent position that the starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is the fulfilment of their commitment in letter and spirit not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India." We have in the past, Sir, taken a position that our national stand is against cross border terrorism emanating from Pakistan. We have used expressions like State sponsored terrorism. We have said that we will not expect terrorism to become an instrument of State policy or that Pakistani soil is used by either State actors or non-State actors for engineering any form of terrorist attacks on India. That has been our national concern.

Now, all this appears somewhat inconsistent with what is stated in the Indo-Pak Joint Statement where it is mentioned and I quote it from the Statement, "Both Prime Ministers recognise that the dialogue is the only way forward. Action on terrorism should not be linked to a composite dialogue process and these should not be bracketed." Are we, therefore, to expect, in view of this Joint Statement that this de-bracketing of terrorism or action on terrorism, which has been done from the composite dialogue process, even if non-cooperation in the matter of action against terrorism is to continue, even if the non-co-operation in the matter of bringing the perpetrators of the crime on 26/11 in Mumbai is to continue, even if the State actors or non-State actors in Pakistan continue to misuse Pakistani soil for perpetrating terrorist attacks on India, all this is going to be now delinked from the composite dialogue process? The explanation which the hon. Prime Minister has given to the House today seems directly in the face of what is in the Declaration.

The two seem patently inconsistent with each other. After all, India's national commitment is not going to be a statement made internally in India. But, after all, it is also going to be a Joint Declaration which India and Pakistan made. So, which of these two appears to be correct?

Shri Sitaram Yechury (CPI-M): Sir, I have two points of clarification from the hon. Prime Minister's Statement. Sir, the first one concerns the remarks he made on his participation as the Guest of Honour in the French National Day. Not only all of us, but the whole of India proud of the recognition that was granted to India. We are all proud because, I think, modern democracy owes a lot to the French Revolution. In that sense also, it has been very nice to see our Prime Minister there. In that context, at the end of the paragraph, he said, "President Sarkozy was categorical in asserting that France is ready for full civil nuclear co-operation with India." Sir, it is very good. But, we have heard the reports that emanated at the G8 Summit that the G8 has put very stringent rules and conditions for transfer of technologies and equipment connected with nuclear reprocessing and enrichment technologies. And this, somehow, runs completely in contradiction with the assurances that the hon. Prime Minister himself gave to both the Houses of Parliament and to the country with regard to the Indo-US Nuclear Deal. We were promised that the Indo-US Nuclear Deal will give us full civilian nuclear cooperation. But the G8 reports suggest the contrary. So, our apprehensions from the Left are now proving correct as we had told you that it will not happen. And, these are now not happening. If that is the case, we also heard a very disturbing reports that the G8 is going to take up this matter with the NSG, so that it draft new rules to make it conditional that only signatories to the NPT and the US's view that only the signatories to both the NPT and the CTBT as well as the FMCT be given or allowed this transfer of technology. If that is the case, Sir, the entire basis or the foundations of the Indo-US Nuclear Deal just collapses. So, we would like to have an assurance from the hon. Prime Minister on this. The second point -- the hon. Leader of the Opposition has also raised this -- is this. I would like to read out three references to the discussions that the hon. Prime Minister has had with the Prime Minister of Pakistan. The first point is the second last paragraph of the Statement which I quote. I fully agree with this. It says, "India seeks co-operative relations with Pakistan, and engagement is the only way forward to realize the vision of a stable and prosperous South Asia living in peace and amity." I agree with this observation. But, this observation is preceded by two other observations which I find them in contradiction and a clarification would be beneficial to all of us and for the country. In paragraph 3 at page 2 of the Statement, Sir, the hon. Prime Minister says and I quote, "It has been and remains our consistent position that the starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is a fulfillment of their commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India."

Underline the words 'the starting point of any meaningful dialogue'. Now, compare it to two paragraphs below. It says, "Action on terrorism should not be linked to the composite dialogue process and, therefore, cannot await other developments". Now, the starting point is a meaningful dialogue on the banning or elimination of cross-border terrorism. If the objective is to seek cooperative relations with Pakistan, then, to say that it should not be linked with the composite dialogue process, gives rise to a lot of conflicting or contradictory position. So, I would like to request the hon. Prime Minister on these points.

Shri D. Raja (D. M. K.): Sir, at the outset, I would like to congratulate the hon. Prime Minister for his successful visit. Since the nuclear issue has been raised, I reiterate what has been asked by my colleague. But, coming to Pakistan, I do appreciate that India and Pakistan will have to engage themselves in a meaningful dialogue. For me, it appears mutual accommodation of concerns on terrorism. The 'composite dialogue' should not become a conditional one. It should continue. Resumption of composite dialogue process, that way, is a positive thing to maintain relations with Pakistan. But, since the Prime Minister had talks with several Heads of the States, particularly with the President of Sri Lanka, I would like to seek one clarification. I don't know whether the Sri Lankan Tamils will be able to get any political solution to their problem; I do not know whether they will have, in the near future, a peaceful co-existence on the basis of equality in the island nation. I would like to know whether the Prime Minister raised these concerns with the President of Sri Lanka.

Dr. Manmohan Singh: Mr. Deputy Chairman, Sir, I am very grateful to the hon. Leader of the Opposition for his intervention as well as the intervention of Shri Sitaram Yechury and Shri D. Raja. Let me be very clear and I repeat what is there in my statement, "It has been and remains our consistent position that the starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is a fulfilment of their commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used, in any manner, for terrorist activities against India." From that point, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has gone on to question the intent and what is stated on page 9, where I have stated that the joint statement says, "Action on terrorism should not be linked to the composite dialogue process, and, therefore, cannot await other developments." This only strengthens our commitment that meaningful process of engagement cannot move forward unless and until Pakistan takes effective measures to control terrorism. It does not mean any dilution of our stand. It only strengthens our stand that we would like Pakistan not to wait for the resumption of the composite dialogue, as and when it takes place. But take action against terrorist elements regardless of these processes that may lead to the resumption of the dialogue.

Sir, Shri Sitaram Yechury raised the issue of full civil nuclear cooperation. I believe, in my absence, Shri Pranab Mukherjee had made a statement either in this House or in the other House.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Sir, he made a Statement in this House.

Dr. Manmohan Singh: Well, if there is an opportunity, I will clarify that position in great detail. I did raise this issue with President Sarkozy and the President Sarkozy was, absolutely, in fact, emphatic that France is eager to enter into full civil nuclear cooperation with India, meaning to emphasize the word 'full' to include ENR technologies. So, therefore, as far as the French position is concerned, I was very reassured by what President Sarkozy told me. I have a Statement regarding what is purported to be the decision taken at the G-8 meeting; maybe, I think, it is too late in the day, on another occasion, I will be very happy to clarify that.

Now, with regard to what Shri Raja has said, I spent a very considerable amount of my time in my meeting with His Excellency President Rajapakse, discussing the Tamil problem. I expressed to him our concern about the plight of Sri Lankan Tamils. There are nearly three lakhs people who are internally displaced persons living in 33 camps and I emphasised to him that he must take all effective measures to provide meaningful relief and rehabilitation, but that is only the beginning of the process. Sri Lankan Government has to create conditions whereby the Tamil people's legitimate political aspirations for a life of dignity and self-respect can be met and the successful process of devolution as envisaged in 1987 Statement with India can be implemented. So, I can assure you, Mr. Raja, that bulk of my time with the President of Sri Lanka was spent in discussing the plight of Sri Lankan Tamils. We are very deeply concerned. I explained to him that we have a legitimate concern about the well being of Sri Lankan Tamils. It has a bearing on Sri Lanka's relations with India, and, therefore, I urged him to do all that he can to satisfy the legitimate political aspirations of the Sri Lankan Tamil community. I thank you, Sir.

040. Address by Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon at the Bureau of Parliamentary Studies and Training on 'Indian Foreign Policy: Opportunities and Challenges'.

New Delhi, July 21, 2009.

Hon'ble Members of Parliament

Secretary General, Lok Sabha

Thank you for asking me to speak to you on the challenges and opportunities that face our foreign policy today. It is an honour to speak to such a distinguished group. In the foreign policy it is normal to list individual relationship with countries or groups. Rather than attempting such a catalogue, which in India's case would take a very long time, I will try to describe the particular purposes which motivate and guide our foreign policy. I thought I would briefly describe the tasks of our foreign policy, how we have gone about them as the world and we have changed, take stock of the present situation and then suggest where we may be going.

The Task

The basic task of India's foreign policy is to enable the domestic transformation of India. By this we mean making possible the transformation of India's economy and society while promoting our values of pluralism, democracy and secularism. This requires us to work for a supportive external environment that is peaceful, thus permitting us to concentrate on our domestic tasks. At the broadest level our foreign policy seeks security and support as we build and change our society and economy.

It was natural that right from the beginning of our independent foreign policy in 1946 we should choose to define our foreign policy in these domestic terms, and not in terms of external dominion, or influence, or "living space", or empire, or other such 19th century power political concepts. It was natural to do so because of the condition that we found our country in after two centuries of colonialism. One of the richest and most industrial economies of the world, which together with China accounted for almost 75% of world industrial output in 1750, had been transformed by the White Man's Burden into one of the poorest, most backward, illiterate and diseased societies on earth by 1947. From 1900 to 1947 the rate of growth of the Indian economy was not even 1%, while population grew steadily at well over 3.5%. The impoverishment of India was continuing. It was therefore natural that our domestic transformation should be the overriding, almost the only, priority.

First Principles

The question of course was how to go about it. We often forget how brave and farsighted our first generation of leaders were. The easy foreign policy choice would have been to join one of the two Cold War alliances, who promised us everything to tempt us to do so. There were those in India whose faith in ourselves was weak who advocated this. But instead we chose non-alignment, which Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru described as the pursuit of our enlightened self interest. This was a decision to stay away from entangling alliances, (and therefore out of other people's fights), and to judge each issue on its merits. This was not a policy of neutrality, autarky or autochthony. We were not cutting ourselves off from the world or abdicating our international responsibilities. We chose sides on the issues, not automatically or due to alliance politics, but on the merits of the issues as we saw them and on the basis of what was in India's interest. This was the beginning of our attempt at strategic autonomy, which we have always seen as essential if we are to have a chance to develop India as we wish to.

In practice, this meant that:

- we followed a neighborhood policy which sought to ensure a peaceful periphery, and an immediate neighborhood free of great power politics, (which Pakistan broke by joining the Baghdad Pact and Cento);
- we tried to have good relations with all the major powers irrespective of ideology, (thus opening up to China and the Soviet Union and provoking Western anger for doing what they did twenty years later);
- we built economic links wherever we could to serve our development, (building the Bokaro steel plant with the Soviet Union when the West refused to help, but also getting PL-480 wheat and Green Revolution technology from the USA); and,

- we engaged in an active peace diplomacy on disarmament and decolonization to minimize the risks of conflict as a result of the Cold War bipolar world, (but not disarming or weakening India in the process).

Taken together these actions sought to build the material basis for our strategic autonomy. This was when our atomic energy and space programmes and modern industry and education began in India. (Both the atomic energy and space programmes first began with foreign collaborations, but aimed at building autonomous national capabilities in India). It is easy to forget the constraints within which this policy operated. The bipolar world was one of unforgiving superpowers. The means available to us in our foreign policy were extremely limited. And we lacked the traditional sources of international power in terms of military capability or raw materials or geostrategic leverage.

The results of these policies were quite remarkable and laid the foundations of our diversified industrial base, of our independent strategic capabilities, and of the over 6% GDP growth that we have enjoyed for the last twenty-six years.

Accelerated Change/The Last Twenty Years

On the basis of what was achieved in the first forty years after independence, it was possible for Indian foreign policy to use the favorable international situation after 1990 to take major steps in furthering our basic tasks. The reform and opening up of our economy in 1991 coincided with the end of the bi-polar Cold War world. In the nineties and early part of this decade, the world economy and world trade grew at a pace that was unprecedented in human history, creating favourable external conditions for India's growth. And India was well placed to take advantage of the situation, thanks to the economic basis laid by our earlier policies, and thanks to the foreign policy of non-alignment, which enabled us to work with all the major powers without exception, from each according to their capacity and according to our need. Our relationship with each of the major powers grew rapidly, and China is now our single largest trading partner. With the USA it was possible for us to undertake the civil nuclear initiative, removing the limitations that had been placed on us after the 1974 Pokhran tests. Today we are more connected to the world than we have been for several centuries, and our links with the world are one reason for the highest ever growth rates that we enjoyed between 2003-8.

This is not to say that the international political situation was not complicated in this period. This was a time when the world polity was moving towards the system that obtains today of "many major powers and one superpower". But while the world was making this shift, the changes were patchy and unevenly distributed. As the world moved steadily towards economic multi-polarity, politically it remained largely unipolar, and militarily US dominance was overwhelming. This was also a period of social polarization in international society, (the other side of globalization), and of the emergence of international terrorism using religion as a pretext, bringing fundamental social changes. The end of the Cold War created strategic space for local powers like Pakistan to foster terrorism as an instrument of state policy, to install regimes like the Taliban Emirate in Afghanistan, and to attempt changing the status quo in J&K at Kargil. Repeated attempts by Indian Prime Ministers from Gujral to Vajpayee to Dr. Manmohan Singh to build a peaceful and cooperative subcontinent were repeatedly obstructed by one or two of our neighbours.

Overall, one might say that the international environment from 1991 to 2007 was supportive of our main foreign policy effort and several positive steps forward towards our economic development and strategic autonomy were achieved in this period despite the political complexity. The clearest symbol of this was the civil nuclear initiative culminating in the September 2008 decision by the NSG to resume civil nuclear cooperation with India without affecting India's strategic nuclear programme in any way. Besides, relationships within the subcontinent, (apart from India-Pakistan relations), certainly improved during this period, and we are today more connected and trade and travel much more than before with our immediate neighbours. Our interdependence with the world economy has increased manifold, with international trade and foreign investment accounting for a steadily increasing share of our GDP. (It is now about 42% of GDP.) Relations with each of the major powers have improved. Today India's participation in the international system is at a level that we have not seen in history since the Mughals.

The Present Situation/Taking Stock

Since 2007, however, the external situation has changed considerably. A combination of factors suggests that the supportive and enabling environment that we enjoyed since 1990 is worsening.

The world economic crisis, which started as a financial crisis at the heart of the Western capitalist system, is still to end. While the world may have dodged a depression like that of the thirties, the world economy is still in a deep recession. Fortunately, while India has been affected, it has been one of the few economies that continue to show growth, of 6.8% in 2008-9. Nor is it clear that the world economy will return to an expansionary phase any time soon. Stimulus packages could accentuate the imbalances that contributed to causing the present crisis. There is a real risk of a period of stagflation following the present recession in the industrialized countries. Our search for markets, technology and resources will be more complicated than it has been in the recent past. We will have to rely to a far greater extent on domestic sources of growth.

Politically as well, we are entering a period of transition from dominance by a single power to a more balanced distribution of power in the international system, short of pure multi-polarity. New alliances are forming, and we are witnessing the rise of a new global power in China. Challenges in our immediate neighborhood, particularly in Pakistan and Afghanistan also test the international system's ability to adjust to changes.

Challenges and opportunities

It is therefore a time of great and unprecedented challenges and opportunities for Indian foreign policy. Our strategic goals must remain the same, to enable the domestic transformation of India by accelerated growth and strategic autonomy. These goals will not change for a long time as we will need time to achieve them. But achieving them in the present economic climate will be a challenge to our skill and ingenuity. There are some opportunities for India in the present crisis to access technologies and resources, but probably not markets. Equally, the crisis also presents an opportunity to improve our relative position in the international balance of power.

The other challenge will be to maintain the remarkable degree of domestic consensus on foreign policy that we have enjoyed over sixty years, even in times of great stress like 1971 or 1998. As protectionism grows and closes markets, and as credit is sucked back into developed economies for their own stimulus and recovery, we will have to rely much more on our own domestic market. This is an opportunity to make the poor bankable, and to bring growth to all of our countrymen, making it truly inclusive.

Politically, as the world transitions to something more like real multi-polarity, existing power holders can hardly be expected to voluntarily or easily cede power to rising powers, whomsoever they may be. We will need to meet the various challenges that are raised in that process. Present power holders will seek to freeze and continue the existing inequities in the international order. Equally, there is an opportunity to work with other rising powers and other countries to build new coalitions to shape the new international architecture that will arise. Global governance is an issue that can no longer be ignored after the economic crisis. The crisis has already provoked agreement, (but not yet action), on redistributing power in the international financial institutions like the IMF and World Bank. This needs to be extended to the political organs of global governance such as the UN Security Council.

The biggest challenge and also the greatest opportunity that I can see for us is in our own neighbourhood. Relations with Pakistan are clearly under severe stress and will require very careful management if the effects of what is happening in Pakistan are not to spill over into India. In Sri Lanka we have just entered an entirely new phase in internal developments where we can hope to rebuild normal lives in Northern and Southern Sri Lanka, working especially with the Sri Lankan Tamils who are the primary victims of 23 years of civil war and of LTTE terrorism.

The world economic crisis also gives us an opportunity to take the lead in economic integration with our neighbours in the subcontinent who look to the growing Indian market to sell their goods and maintain their own growth. A South Asian Economic Recovery Initiative could build on our strengths and help to develop the cooperative relationships that we need in our periphery.

Conclusion

Thank you for the patient hearing. I have tried to give you a broad brush picture of the sort of larger themes which affect and determine our foreign policy, but seldom find their way into our headlines and newspapers. It is a measure of the wisdom of our early leaders that the goals and principles that they set for our foreign policy are still valid and relevant and remain as good a guide to our daily foreign policy choices. And they must remain so, as long as some Indians are poor or excluded from the fruits of the growth and modernization of India.

041. Interview of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna with the Managing Editor Raj Chengappa of the weekly India Today.

New Delhi, July 23, 2009.

Q. Your government is being accused of capitulating to Pakistan at the talks at Sharm el-Sheikh.

Ans. We have not capitulated. India is too big and mature a country for these situations.

Q. What was the reasoning behind India's approach?

Ans. India's approach is that we can never afford to take a position where we refuse to talk to a nation. Our immediate reaction after the Mumbai terror strike was that we were suspending the composite dialogue till Pakistan brought to justice those who were the perpetrators of the attacks. That remains our position even today and we have not relented on that stand at Sharm el-Sheikh. Pakistan's Prime Minister Yousaf Raza Gilani had assured our prime minister that they were very serious in going after those responsible for Mumbai 26/11. This assurance prompted the issuance of the joint statement.

Q. Why did you delink the composite dialogue from the terror issue?

Ans. While we may have delinked the composite dialogue from terror, we continued to impress on Pakistan the need to take steps on terror. We told them that there could be no repetition of the kind of terror attack. It was also impressed on Gilani that the terror instrumentality that had been created in Pakistan has to be destroyed.

We told them that terror knows no boundary and can manifest itself anywhere; that terror cannot be fought on a selective basis but across the board; that we are looking forward to more decisive steps to fight terror because it is in Pakistan's own interest that they do so. We have asked Pakistan to show the same kind of commitment to fighting militants targeting India as they have done in fighting terror in the Swat region. As has been reiterated by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in Parliament, we stick to our stand that the composite dialogue can wait till the terror-related issues are settled.

Q. But the prime minister had told the Pakistan President that his mandate for talks was limited to how Pakistan handled terror. So what changed in the interim?

Ans. We wanted to give Pakistan a chance to prove or disprove that they are in control of the machinery in Pakistan. Here is an opportunity for Pakistan to prove they are in total control; that they are going after the terrorists. There are a chain of events that have happened subsequently. After we came back, I think, certain steps have been initiated by Pakistan in terms of follow-up action they propose to take. They have arrested five people responsible for the Mumbai attacks and have filed chargesheets against them and their trial is to start soon in Pakistan. We also received a dossier from them which we are studying. Now there is Mohammed Ajmal Kasab's confession. So we are going stage by stage. Let's wait and watch on how things unfold.

Q. There are experts who believe it is futile to talk to Pakistan. So why talk to Pakistan at all?

Ans. Because they are our neighbour and we have outstanding issues with them. We have to make an effort to resolve these issues as neighbours. So we will have to continue to talk to Pakistan. There is no alternative. We have to keep them engaged so that we know what they are planning and what they are up to. If you want to focus on development of India, we need to have peace on our borders. It is in India's national interest.

Q. The joint statement also mentions Pakistan's concerns about India's alleged involvement in Balochistan. Why was it included?

Ans. The Indian position is that our conscience is clear and as a nation we don't do anything nefarious and that's why if you want to mention Balochistan, do it by all means. It is an open book as far as India is concerned as we have nothing to hide.

Q. Coming to the visit of US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, what's the reason she had so many engagements in Mumbai and Delhi as compared to the time spent talking bilateral issues with you?

Ans. Perhaps Clinton wanted to disabuse the kind of impression that was gaining ground in India that the Barack Obama administration was lukewarm towards India. I think right throughout her visit, her pronouncements have all been very positive towards India. Then in our bilateral talks, she sounded positive, sounded decisive at times. So we feel that we can continue to depend on the Obama administration. And the fact that Manmohan Singh has been bestowed the honour of being the first visiting statesman to the White House in November is further indication of the fact that contrary to the whispers we hear, we are on the right note with the United States.

Q. There were some concerns about the recent G8 proposal to restrict sales of nuclear enrichment and reprocessing technology to non-signatories of NPT including India. Will this alter America's approach while dealing with India?

Ans. No. On India's civil nuclear treaty with the US, Clinton said they are very serious and will continue to make headway according to the agreement. Nothing is going to change.

Q. Finally, there seems to be a sense of drift in India's foreign policy whether in relations with Pakistan or the United States or other countries.

Ans. I disagree. There is a thread of continuity in India's foreign policy. Our response or degree of emphasis may vary from time to time but the thread is visible. There is absolutely no drift or ambivalence.

042. Remarks by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh on the launch of the Advanced Technology Vehicle.

Visakhapatnam, July 26, 2009.

I am honoured to be present here today on the occasion of the launch of India's first indigenous nuclear powered submarine.

I congratulate the ATV Programme and all personnel associated with it for achieving a historic milestone in the country's defence preparedness. Today's launch is a reflection of the immense technical expertise that exists in our country and the strength of our research and development organisations. More importantly, the launch represents the determination and patriotism of our technologists, scientists and defence personnel who have overcome several hurdles and barriers to enable the country to acquire self-reliance in the most advanced areas of defence technology*.

The construction of a submarine is a highly demanding task by itself. For the country to develop its first nuclear submarine is a special achievement. Today we join a select group of five nations who possess the capability to build a nuclear powered submarine.

I am particularly glad that this submarine is the outcome of a productive public-private partnership. Private industry in India has evolved considerably during the last few decades and we should leverage its strengths to achieve our defence goals. I would also like to express our appreciation to our Russian friends for their consistent and invaluable cooperation, which symbolizes the close strategic partnership that we enjoy with Russia.

* Pakistan Foreign Ministry reacting to the launch of the submarine said on July 27 that the "continued induction of new lethal weapon systems" by India was detrimental to regional peace and stability. "Without entering into an arms race with India, Pakistan will take all appropriate steps to safeguard its security and maintain strategic balance in South Asia," a Foreign Ministry statement said, calling for the "maintenance of strategic balance" in the interests of peace and security in the region. Pakistan Navy spokesman Captain Asif Majeed Butt was quoted by Dawn News as saying the addition of the submarine to the Indian Navy was a "destabilising step which would jeopardise the security paradigm of the entire Indian Ocean region." Captain Majeed said the induction of the new submarine could trigger a nuclear arms race and all littoral states, including Pakistan, would take steps to safeguard themselves. Another spokesman for the Navy, Salman Ali, was reported by Aaj TV as saying the new Indian Navy acquisition was "dangerous for regional peace and balance." Defence Minister Ahmed Mukhtar said Pakistan was fully capable of defending itself. "We don't want war but the Government of Pakistan is fully aware of the issue and we are fully prepared to defend ourselves," he said in reply to a question.

The sea is increasingly becoming relevant in the context of India's security interests and we must re-adjust our military preparedness to this changing environment. Our Navy has a huge responsibility in this regard.

The Government is fully committed to ensuring the defence of our national interests and the protection of our territorial integrity. We will continue to render all support to the constant modernization of our armed forces and to ensuring that they remain at the cutting edge of technology.

We do not have any aggressive designs nor do we seek to threaten anyone. We seek an external environment in our region and beyond that is conducive to our peaceful development and the protection of our value systems. Nevertheless it is incumbent upon us to take all measures necessary to safeguard our country and to keep pace with technological advancements worldwide. It has rightly been said that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

The years of hard work, dedication and perseverance that have gone into today's launch are an example worthy of emulation. They show that no task is difficult and that there is no greater power than the power of self-belief. I am confident that the lessons learnt this launch will enable the ATV Programme to achieve even better results in the coming years.

With these few words, I once again congratulate all the organisations and personnel who have been involved in the ATV Programme and on behalf of the country, wish them continued success in the future.

043. Discussions in the Lok Sabha on the issues arising out of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's visits abroad.

New Delhi, July 29 and 30, 2009.

July 29, 2009.

Note: the text in italics is free translation of the original Hindi text.

Shri Yashwant Sinha (Bharatiya Janata Party) – Madam Chairperson, I am grateful to you that you have allotted time for this discussion. I am also grateful to you that you have given me an opportunity to speak. I am also grateful to my leader for choosing me to put forth the views of my party on this important issue. Recently we have been hearing of quite a few pillars of the Delhi Metro cracking and some have fallen as well. The enquiry for that is going on separately but during the Prime Minister's recent visit to foreign countries, quite a few cracks have developed in the pillars of India's foreign policy and some have fallen as well. The country's foreign policy has always run on national consensus. Irrespective of who is in government, they always take the opposition parties into confidence on important issues, discuss with representatives of the other political parties and then decide on the plan of action so that the national consensus is maintained. It is with great regret that I have to say that in the last few years this national consensus has almost finished as the tradition of taking everybody into confidence on the way ahead has been done away with. In our traditional foreign policy in respect of Pakistan, our national consensus has always been our basis and strength.

Madam Chairperson, I feel for the first time that on such an important issue, the national consensus not only floundered; it cracked and then collapsed totally. This has been the first time. Madam chairperson, through your good office I would like to take the house into confidence. I would like to state that the attacks on Mumbai was not an ordinary terrorist attack, it was an attack of Pakistan on India. After the attacks, the Honourable Prime Minister had made the following comments in this House which I am quoting.

"Firstly, we have to galvanize the international community into dealing with sternly and effectively with the epicentre of terrorism which is located in Pakistan."

The infrastructure of terrorism has to be dismantled permanently. The Prime Minister also informed the House that he had told several Heads of State and Government who had called him up that India would not be satisfied with only assurances. He said “the use of terrorism as an instrument of State policy is no longer acceptable.”

These are not my words, Madam; these are the words of the Prime Minister of India. After that on July 16, the Prime Minister met the President of Pakistan, President Zardari, in Yekaterinburg and admonished him in the hearing of the whole world. He told him:

“I am happy to meet you, but my mandate is limited to telling you that the territory of Pakistan must not be allowed to be used for terrorism against India.”

Strong words; we all felt very proud of our Prime Minister; here was our Prime Minister, fresh from his victory at the polls, confident, assertive, ready to tell Pakistan and the rest of the world, “Do not mess around with us”.

That was the message that he had conveyed, and we felt proud that the Prime Minister had conveyed this message on behalf of the whole country. ... (Interruptions)

Shri J.M. Aaron Rashid (Congress): It is a feather in the cap of the hon. Prime Minister.

Shri Yashwant Sinha: I will praise him whenever he deserves praise. In less than a month, at Sharm-el-Sheikh, there was a complete turnaround from this stated position, and a Joint Statement was issued. In the Joint Statement, there are many points, and I would like to take them one by one which stand out. What are these points,”

They considered the entire gamut of bilateral relations with a view to charting the way forward in India-Pakistan relations. [I emphasize the words entire gamut of bilateral relations.]

Second, both leaders agreed that terrorism is the main threat to both countries.

Third, Prime Minister Singh reiterated the need to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attack to justice. Prime Minister Gilani assured that Pakistan will do everything in this regard.

Fourth, Prime Minister Gilani mentioned that Pakistan has some information on threats in Balochistan and other areas.

Fifth, both Prime Ministers recognized that dialogue is the only way forward. Action on terrorism should not be linked to the composite dialogue process and these should not be bracketed.”

The sixth point is, the Prime Minister Singh said that India was ready to discuss all issues with Pakistan including all outstanding issues. Seventh point is, the Prime Minister Singh reiterated India's interest. Please note that the Prime Minister Singh reiterated India's interest in a stable, democratic, Islamic, Republic of Pakistan. And finally, both leaders agreed that the two countries will share real time-credible, actionable information on any future threats. Both Foreign Secretaries will meet as often as necessary and report to the Foreign Ministers who will meet on the sidelines of the forthcoming UN General Assembly.

Now, let us take up these issues from the Joint Statement that I have just placed before you. The first is, the two Prime Ministers discussed the entire gamut of bilateral relations. It was not merely confined to cross border terrorism. It was not merely confined to holding Pakistan guilty of the acts of terrorism that it has unleashed on our sacred soil. We discussed, the Prime Minister discussed the whole gamut of bilateral relations. So, the whole thing was expanded. Secondly, when we say that both leaders agreed that terrorism is the main threat to both countries, then they put India and Pakistan at par. The distinction between the aggressor and the victim was obliterated, completely obliterated because we are both victims of terrorism. So, where is the question of being the perpetrator of terrorism and where is the question of being the victim of terrorism? Then Pakistan gave the assurance that it would do all within its power to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attacks to justice. We know that the Home Minister of Pakistan has said that they have absolutely no evidence against Hafiz Saeed of Jammata-ud-Dawa. I heard our own distinguished Home Minister tell the television channels today that we have given enough evidence to Pakistan to prosecute Hafiz Saeed and yet the Pakistan Home Minister says that India has given no evidence, they have freed Hafiz Saeed, there is nothing pending against Hafiz Saeed. The mastermind of the Mumbai attack has been let loose by Pakistan. No action is being taken against him. And we say that we will take all the action which is necessary.

Now I come to Balochistan. Now why on earth was Balochistan included? We have nothing to hide. Yes, of course, we have nothing to hide. We have nothing to hide, Madam, on many other issues. So, shall we put all those issues in a bilateral document where we have nothing to hide? Is this an argument that if we have nothing to hide, we will put it in the bilateral document? I was going through some of the newspaper reports just now because the Pakistanis now, at the official level, at the level of their Home Minister and the Prime Minister started talking about Balochistan no sooner did the ink dry on this joint statement. And today, the Pakistani Home Minister has said that Pakistan will use the Balochistan reference to the hilt. He said that evidence of Indian involvement in Balochistan would be presented at international forums at the appropriate time. And they have seriously accused India of supplying arms to the Baluchs. They have accused India of using our Consulates in Afghanistan to train them and give the money and arms. This is the allegation, Madam, that Pakistan has been raising ever since those Consulates in Afghanistan were established.

My distinguished colleague the former Foreign Minister Mr. Jaswant Singh is here. It was during his time that decision was taken that we would establish these four Consulates in Afghanistan. Since then Pakistan has been uncomfortable. I would like to tell the House, through you Madam, as Foreign Minister of India I travelled to Afghanistan and spent not two hours but two days in Afghanistan, and saw with my own eyes the kind of respect that the people of Afghanistan have for India. You have to go there to see this very palpable respect and love. There is a lot of love and affection for the Indian people there. Wherever I went, they showed me a lot of respect and that is why we do not need to depend on anybody. The friendship between India and Afghanistan is time tested, it has been there for centuries. Nobody can end this friendship and definitely not Pakistan. Pakistan has put in its best efforts to see that India closed all its consulates there. They complained to the Afghanistan government but President Karzai did not accept and refused them. Then they went to the Americans, they too did not accept and refused them. After that when they were defeated in their attempts, they organised a terrorist attack on our embassy in Kabul in which there were a lot of casualties, diplomats died, our defence attaché was killed in addition to others. There was a worldwide discussion on this because Pakistan's ISI was behind this. The CIA had intercepts to this effect. They shared this with the Indian government in which it was proved that Haqqani's, Pakistan's terrorist's, hand was there in it. The ISI had got him to attack our embassy. Now Baluchistan has been brought into this joint statement and so this matter is not going to die down. If I have any experience in foreign affairs, then I would like to caution that Baluchistan is going to give a lot of headache to India in the coming days. We will go to international conventions and the Pakistani representative will stand up against us and bring up the topic of Baluchistan and we will feel ashamed and bow our heads. Just today in the BBC I saw, a Pakistani journalist Ahmed Rasheed has written something to which a lot of people have pointed to, he has clearly written –

When Pakistani and Indian leaders met in Egypt on 16th July, Prime Minister Yusuf Raza Gilani handed over an intelligence dossier to his Indian counterpart Manmohan Singh outlining India's alleged role in destabilising Pakistan from Afghanistan. This included funding and training of Balooch militants for the separatist insurgency in Balochistan province, and providing support for the Pakistan Taliban, in particular its leader Baitulla Mehsud."

I would like to request to the Prime Minister that when he intervenes in this discussion, then he should definitely take the house into confidence as to whether he received such a dossier or not.

Prime Minister (Dr. Manmohan Singh): I can categorically say no such dossier was ever given to me.

Shri Yashwant Sinha: I am happy. We will rather believe our own Prime Minister than any journalist. I raised this issue only because I wanted the Prime Minister to get up and state in this House that no such dossier has been given and we will say that the issue stands settled for the time being here.

Shri Pinaki Misra (Biju Janata Dal): Indeed, no such dossier exists. That is the point.

Shri Yashwant Sinha: there has been a lot of discussion as to why our Prime Minister agreed to the proposal that terrorism and composite dialogue process will not be linked. In fact, the joint Statement says that they will not be linked and goes on to emphasise that they will not be bracketed. Almost as if the same thing had not been said that ' all issues and all outstanding issues' in the same way that They will not be linked and they will not be bracketed. Now, I have heard, because the spin doctors of the Government had been at work and there have been selective leaks in the media. A lot of things have come through the media but I want to ask that if it has been delinked and they will not be bracketed, then you will study it in what context? Because in the joint statement that the Prime Minister had issued with President Musharraf in 2005, it was clearly mentioned that terrorism will not be allowed to impede the peace process. We at the Bharatiya Janata Party had issued our statement on that day itself that that in this way you are reassuring the terrorists that they can keep on with their terrorist activities but we will keep on talking with each other. It is a different issue that they could not toe that line themselves. It will not be delinked. It will get delinked because what we are saying is all issues, including all outstanding issues, when you are saying all issues, then why isn't all outstanding issues included. What is the meaning of all outstanding issues and if I have any knowledge of this, Madam, I would like to say that in the India-Pakistan context when you talk of all outstanding issues, then automatically Jammu-Kashmir gets included and the Pakistanis have made this very clear. The Pakistani Prime Minister himself has said that all outstanding issues means Jammu and Kashmir. I have not problem, in the composite dialogue Jammu and Kashmir is also an issue. Let us talk. We have nothing to hide on Jammu and Kashmir also. But hiding that the spin doctors are telling the government that we have had some big achievement that the 'K' word did not occur. If it was such a major achievement, then why has all outstanding issues been written. With all humility I would like to ask the prime Minister of India, Prime Minister of the democratic, socialist secular Republic of India, why did he agree to call Pakistan, the Islamic Republic of Pakistan? Is India committed to Islamisation of Pakistan? Tomorrow if the Pakistani people themselves decide that, we will become secular.....(Interruption)

Is India committed; is India interested in Pakistan remaining Islamic all the time? What does that mean? And this is a statement, this sentence is not a joint statement, coming from the Prime Minister of India. This point has been made by the Prime Minister of India. There are a lot of documents between India and Pakistan where we just say Pakistan. If we go into detail, then we say Republic of Pakistan but we never say Islamic republic of Pakistan from our side. Let them say, we don't have to say it.....(Interruption)

Madam Chairperson, Pakistan information sharing is that we will share real time credible information on terrorism with each other. I would like to ask the prime Minister that this was the motive when we said in Havana that we will make a joint terror mechanism. Terrorism is an issue in the composite dialogue with Pakistan. The Home Secretaries of both the countries have been meeting and have been having dialogues on this. Not satisfied with this, the Prime Minister in Havana in 2006 made a separate joint terror mechanism between the two countries. Now when we are talking from 2006 to 2009, in these three years, have the two countries not been able to have real time credible information sharing? We have American documents in which Americans have said that they are playing the role of the umpire in this, they are bringing the intelligence agencies of these two countries together and when they have difference of opinion, they act as judge. With this they are ensuring that the intelligence agencies of the two countries work together. In September when there will be the session of the UN General Assembly, the foreign ministers of the two countries will meet. But before this itself we are saying that – the foreign Secretaries will meet as often as necessary. It is now the end of July, we still have one month in August. In September the foreign ministers of both countries will meet but as often as necessary how many times will they meet. Five times? Ten times? What will they talk?

Madam, with a lot of seriousness I wish to say that the joint statement that was issued in Sharm El-Sheikh, the ink had not even dried on that statement when both the prime minister had torn and thrown the statement to pieces. I doubt that there exists a joint statement between two countries in which the interpretation of the two countries is so wide apart as Prime Minister Gilani and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh have done. Prime Minister Gilani on coming out said –

“It is a great diplomatic victory for Pakistan.”

I heard it with my own ears. He came out and said that it was a great diplomatic victory for Pakistan. He interpreted the joint statement to mean that India had agreed to revive the composite dialogue process. And what did our Prime Minister say in Sharm el-sheikh when he met the media. Maybe somebody went and told him that the Pakistanis had taken a lead and that he should also meet the media. He met the media after an hour and said –

“Unless and until the terrorism is tackled and terror infrastructure dismantled, I will not be able to carry public opinion with me.”

You are absolutely right Mr. Prime Minister. The public opinion in India will not be with you unless you hold Pakistan to these two issues – terrorism must end and the infrastructure of terrorism must be destroyed in Pakistan forever. All this finished and then what happened? When the discussion started in our country as to what the Prime Minister had done in Sharm-el- sheikh, the government’s spin doctors became active. ....(Interruption)

Our minister of state for foreign affairs is sitting here, he is very experienced. Who will have more experience in diplomacy than him? He has worked in the United Nations. There is only diplomacy in the United Nations. What did he say –

“No, no. This is only a diplomatic paper and not a legal document. Dismiss it as a diplomatic paper.”

This was a Joint statement. This government had forgotten previously but suddenly it now gives reference to the statement of January 6, 2004 which had been issued during Prime Minister Atal Behari Vajpayee's term when he had gone for the SAARC Summit in Islamabad. Let me remind him that this was only a Joint Press statement. It was not even a Joint statement. What was issue in Islamabad on January 06, 2004 was a Joint Press statement and today it is referred to by your own government, when I quoted the Prime Minister when he said Pakistan's territory should not be allowed to be used. What was the language? That language was in that January 06, 2004 statement. It saddens me to say that again no official stood up and said that this is bad drafting and the matter did not stop there, they said it is bad drafting, these things will happen. Bad drafting and these things will happen; it is not a legal document; it is only a diplomatic paper. I would like somebody from the government to stand up in this house and say that we do not accept that that is bad drafting.

Now whatever happened, whatever the circumstances but from whatever experience I have on foreign affairs, I would like to definitely say that when drafting happen and especially of summit meetings, drafts don't happen just like that. A lot of time is spent in making the drafts. Each word, comma, full stop and its placement is seen and scrutinised and only then the finalisation takes place. Then how did this draft happen. I read in a newspaper somewhere, again courtesy the spin doctors, that no, no, the two Prime Ministers met for some time, then the foreign secretaries of the two countries were called and told that this is what they had discussed and were asked to make a draft based on that. Then the foreign secretaries sat for two hours and were drafting. Where were the foreign ministers I do not know. But both the Secretaries made the draft and showed it to their principals and then the draft must have got approved. I also have some experience of the draft of 2004 and with full responsibility I would like to state in this House that when such a final draft came before Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee, he read each line and each word and then suggested some amendments in that. Bring this line before this line and the people who were discussing said, if they did not agree, then what? It was time for us to leave Islamabad and Prime Minister Vajpayee said if they agree, we will issue the statement and if they do not agree, we will go home. It is not necessary that after every meeting a statement is issued. If it does not suit us, we will not issue a statement. We did not issue a statement in Agra. If it did not happen, it did not happen. We had a dialogue, there was no result, there will be no statement, then the Prime Minister said I am prepared to walk more than half the distance. I am saying that he has walked all the way. He has gone to the Pakistani camp and acted exactly as they said. Where is the half-way?.....(Interruption)

Madam speaker, I would like to say that.....

Shri Adhir Chowdhury: Madam Speaker, I would like to quote Rule 353 of the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Lok Sabha. It says:

“No allegation of a defamatory or incriminatory nature shall be made by a Member against any person unless the Member has given (adequate advance notice) to the Speaker and also to the Minister concerned so that he Minister may be able to make an investigation into the matter for the purpose of a reply:”

Madam, he is saying that he has gone to Pakistan, who has gone to Pakistan? It should be deleted.

Madam Speaker: Hon. Member, I will look into it. You have made your point. ... (Interruptions)

... (Interruptions)

Shri Yashwant Sinha: Madam chairperson, I would like to ask the Prime Minister some questions..... (Interruptions)

.....(Interruptions)

Shri Yashwant Sinha: I want to put some questions to the hon. Prime Minister and I hope he will be good enough to answer them. The first question is this. Firstly, has the trust deficit between India and Pakistan, after the Joint Statement and meeting, widened or narrowed? Secondly, what changed between 16th June, when he met President Zardari, and 16th July, when he met Prime Minister Gilani at Sharm El Sheik? What has brought about this complete change of heart? What has happened? Thirdly, Pakistan has already gone to town on Baluchistan. But the Prime Minister has said that there was no dossier given. So, I am not asking that question. Then, what are the achievements of the anti-terror mechanism set up after 2006 in Havana? The Prime Minister has said it in his Joint Statement of 4th April, 2005. It was a ringing statement saying that the peace process between India and Pakistan was now irreversible. Does he stand by it now, that the peace process between India and Pakistan is irreversible and that they will go on doing what they like? Still this will go on? On the matter of Pakistan I would humbly tell the Prime Minister that history did not start in 2004 on the day he became Prime minister. India-Pakistan relations have a long history. My submission is that whosoever ignores this long historical journey, its paths, the pauses, the goals, his journey or way forward will never be successful.

Madam Chairperson, the prime Minister spoke to Shri Musharraf, we also did. When Shri Musharraf was the president, he wrote a book – “In the Line of Fire” Please read this book. As President of Pakistan, he is writing that book and let me tell you, when I went through that book, the feeling that he has about India. India is an enemy country. He has repeated that almost 50 times that India is an enemy country I gave them a bloody nose here; Kargil was a great success. You are dealing with such kind of people.....(Interruption)

...(Interruptions)

Shri Yashwant Sinha: Madam chairperson, I would like to tell the Prime minister that what happened in Sharm El-Sheikh, we need to literally drown ourselves in the collective waters of the seven oceans and even that won't be enough for washing away our shame. All the waters of Neptune will not wash away the shame of Sharm El-Sheikh.... (Interruptions) Madam chairperson, so many people have written in India Today. But India Today has supported this government so much that people like us were totally at wit's end when it came to the question of the nuclear deal.

In issue after issue they wrote in support of the government for the nuclear deal. But India Today in their latest issues have in their front page headlined 'Timid India'. Inside they have written “As a result of the surrender at Sharm-el-Sheikh, the impression has gone out that India is negotiated.” This is what they have said.

Madam, after this the prime Minister went to L'Aquila in Italy. In this there are two issues, one of climate change, I was listening during the question hour and Shri Jairam Ramesh said we will not accept quantitative restrictions, we will not accept caps. I would like that the 2 degree Celsius reduction that has been talked about, there has been talk of a limit up to that point and the other issue is that of peaking. It must peak.

Madam, I would like to bring out some terms in front of the house that today per capita emission of green house gases in the US is 20 tonnes. India's position in per capita emission is 137th. If we accept restriction or caps above this under that peaking formula, we will be limited to only three tonnes.

That is why I would like the Prime Minister to stand in the house and assure the house that India will not accept restrictions under any circumstances. I would like to enlighten the house that in respect of the scheduled Copenhagen conference on climate change, America has already passed relevant laws in its House of Representatives in this respect under which any country which does not adhere to its standards, there will be punitive tariff on products imported from that country to the United States. US State Representatives have been given the power, the Bill will be passed in the senate and after that it will become law. Today using this medium, I would like to warn the house that if the government decides to bow down on this issue, we will take on the government on this issue.

Madam, after this in the nuclear deal it has come up whether ENR - Enrichment and Reprocessing Technology will be made available to us or not. Some honourable members who are sitting here have given statements in the other house that we are not totally concerned and when a journalist asked "Are you mildly concerned? Are you casually concerned if you are not totally concerned? Are you moderately concerned?" But I would like to say that we had a lot of debate after July 2008 when in this same house the last government underwent the vote of confidence, as if we people had forgotten the nuclear deal. There was no discussion on the nuclear deal. The Prime Minister said that he will come before the parliament, he did not come. None of us asked for a discussion and we forgot that the 123 Agreement which we had with the US, when that became law in the United states, in section 204 it is clearly written that America will not give India the enrichment and Reprocessing Technology. It is also written that they will work with the NSF, nuclear suppliers group so that no other country also gives that technology or equipment to India. Now here what the spin doctors are saying is that no, we will reprocess. The Prime Minister went to France, it was published that President Sarkozy has assured that the fuel that we buy from France, that we can reprocess, we can do it from Russia. It is not a question of reprocessing but a question of technology and equipment for the reprocessing. Till now whatever fuel we use, we are reprocessing that also.

America has only put a condition that whatever we buy from America, we have to make a special plant. We have to make with our own equipment, our own money, our own technology and after that whether they will give us permission or not, is for us to wonder in the future. It is absolutely clear that non-NPT countries of which India is one, those countries will not be given under any circumstances. In this he himself has said when he went to America and he had his last meeting with the then President, Bush, the house will remember, he said, "The people of India love you, Mr. Bush." The same president Bush when on 10th September sent his presidential recommendation, he said in that – we will not give India sensitive technology. Condoleeza Rice assured the Chief of the House Committee for Foreign affairs of the House of Representatives, Howard Berman that - There is not only no question of transferring the technology to India, but we will work with the NSG to make sure that the NSG puts a ban. Of the 45 members of the NSG, leaving out China, only these 8 countries have the capability to give the technology and equipment. They have refused. NSG hasn't come to a consensus as yet but the statement that they gave in L' Aquila, Italy, they have refused in that. Should we hold America responsible? No. Because America has repeatedly clarified and we have also repeatedly clarified. The Prime Minister who has stood in both the houses and said – full civil nuclear cooperation and trade, he has said we will not agree if they impose restrictions. I have before me all the statements that he has given in both houses. What can I say? I can only say that with regret that he has broken all the pledges that he has given in both the houses, he has not been able to keep those promises.....(Interruption)

Madam, the last point that I would like to take up, I had raised in the house the agreement that we have made with NDU. It is not yet clear as to why we have made the agreement with NDU. That day the foreign minister came to the house. The statement that he gave, there are only two sentences in that on the NDU agreement, on the monitoring agreement. We are in the same state of darkness that we were before. . I would like the prime minister and the foreign minister to give an answer to the house as to under the NDU agreement what have we done with America. In the meantime the spin doctors of the government have started working. So the answer that they came up with was that when the NDA government was in power, even we bought weapon locating radars from America. It was even publicized that in that the NDU agreement is attached. It was also said that American inspectors came here and inspected it as well. Here I would like to say that, I don't have government files, you have government files, please stand up and clarify that when we bought weapons locating radar in 2002 from America then at that time was there an agreement with NDU. As per my information, there was no agreement. You are misguiding the house and I have a copy of that agreement. I will tell what is written. Understood.....(Interruption) That is why please do not cause confusion here.....(Interruption) That is why I say whatever you do, please take the house into confidence, what is the meaning of the agreement with NDU?

End use agreement, Climate change, nuclear deal and Pakistan, four pillars on which our foreign policy is balancing, and has collapsed like the metro. A concrete pillar can still be made to lift the metro but the pillars on which the foreign policy is balancing, if they fall, our prestige can collapse. ... (Interruption).....

Madam, I would like to say that such frightening mistakes in such a short time have perhaps rarely happened in India's history that within such a short period of time, we have piled up one State after another. I do not know where the foreign policy of India today is. Thank you.

Shri P.C. Chacko (Congress): Madam Speaker, we have been waiting with great attention and interest that the senior leader of the main Opposition Party, an experienced foreign policy expert and former External Affairs Minister, will throw some light on the issue which we are discussing.

Madam, I must say that Yashwant Sinha Ji, with all his experience and information in his hands and the articulation, could not prove the point which he was arguing. He has been always an expert in arguing weak cases but today he has miserably failed in his attempt.

I feel that, at least, he will justify his own Party's programme of Padyatra from Parliament to Rashtrapati Bhavan yesterday. We thought that he would be able to justify that Padyatra. Not only that Yashwant Sinha Ji has disappointed this whole House but he has disappointed his own Party men. I have been watching the faces of his colleagues sitting at the back and the pale of gloom on the faces of his colleagues is an ample proof that Yashwant Sinha Ji could not even convince his own Party colleagues.

Madam, I legitimately expected that like Mr. Jaswant Singh, the other day, had complimented our Finance Minister, after these allegations which they have to do as a ritual to justify their stand, finally he will come out with, at least, a word of compliment to our hon. Prime Minister. Even that he did not do. I am really sorry about it.

Madam, he has seen some cracks in the pillars on the Metro Rail here, which we have all seen. He has seen some cracks in our foreign policy pillars also, which none of us are able to see those cracks in the foreign policy pillars... (Interruptions) Madam, there was something which also I will tell them and if they are interested they should patiently listen to it.

Madam, the foreign policy pillars of this country were not shaken when the hon. Prime Minister went to Sharm-el-Sheikh but when the former Prime Minister went in a bus from here to Lahore. When he reached Lahore, at that point of time, our foreign policy pillars were shaking because in Kargil the Pakistani soldiers were infiltrating into India.

Madam, he has rightly said that Mumbai Attack was an attack on the sovereignty of India. Yes, we do agree. That was reiterated in clear terms by the Prime Minister in this Joint Statement – I will read that wording later. But Madam, there was another attack, which we, sitting here in this House, cannot forget. This happened in 2001 when Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee was the Prime Minister of this country.

Hon. Advani ji was the Home Minister of this country. This very citadel of the Indian Parliament was attacked. ... (Interruptions) It is good to remember Bombay. We will always remember Bombay... (Interruptions)

... (Interruptions)

Shri P.C. Chacko: But, when this Parliament was attacked... (Interruptions)

... (Interruptions)

Shri P.C. Chacko: As once said by our hon. Prime Minister, the lohpurush, the strong man of BJP, was sleeping when he was the Home Minister and when this Parliament was attacked. It was an eye ball to eye ball fight. It was almost a war on India.

What happened after the Parliament attack? Then happened the Agra Summit. Yashwant Sinha ji is against any dialogue with Pakistan. Is that the position of India? Is that the position of this country that we will not talk to Pakistan, we will not talk to any other country? Sorry, Yashwant Sinha ji, that is not the position of this country. We are for the dialogue in the country and your Prime Minister with all fanfare went to Agra for discussion. What happened there? President Musharraf came to Agra. You hosted him and he was taken around Taj Mahal. The whole country was watching. He went back without signing a joint declaration. He went back accusing India. That is what happened there. The Agra conclave was held in the background of the attack on the Parliament. Please do not forget this. You may be quoting many instances; there are umpteen instances we can quote that you never had the self-respect when you raised the issue with Pakistan. You were never bold enough to speak to them in the language in which the Prime Minister is speaking. I would like to quote:

“Prime Minister Singh reiterated the need to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai attacks to justice. Prime Minister Gilani assured that Pakistan will do everything in its power in this regard.

“ Has Pakistan ever agreed or ever come to these terms in the past? Can Yashwant Sinha ji tell us? Pakistan was always saying that we have nothing to do with the Bombay attack. Pakistan was always saying that Kasab is not a citizen of Pakistan. Pakistan was always saying: “Why should we bother about it? We have nothing; we are not going to do any inquiry.” When our Prime Minister said that the perpetrators of that crime should be brought to book, what was the reaction of Mr. Gilani? Yashwant Sinha ji, you please accept, when the Prime Minister of this country talked in unmistakable terms, what is the sentiment of this country? ... (Interruptions)

.....(Interruption)

Shri P.C. Chacko: Madam Chairman, it is all the more interesting. They are speaking in the name of the people... (Interruptions) Hon. Yashwant Sinha ji, the Spokesperson of the principal Opposition Party, I request the BJP Members to at least see how they pick up courage to speak on behalf of the people. It is a party which even elected a Prime Minister before the election. No other party has ever elected a Prime Minister before the election. But they were outright rejected by the people. Such a party is coming and is today speaking on behalf of the people. Here a Prime Minister is sitting who was elected by the people.... (Interruptions)

I am not yielding. Here a Prime Minister is sitting who has got the support of the people of this country. There is a person who spoke on behalf of the BJP which is a party rejected by the people. With what courage you are speaking on behalf of the people?

So, please do not speak on behalf of the people; speak on behalf of you.

Madam, there were some instances. I am not going into the details. When the BJP Government went to discuss with the President Musharraf in Agra, those days there was an interesting inside story in the BJP. Madam Chairperson, you may also be knowing about that. The Home Minister of this country was not aware of what was going to happen in Agra. That was the talk in those days. Shri Advani's view was that he was not aware of what was happening in Agra. Finally, insulting this country, Musharraf went from Agra issuing a statement against this country. These are all facts. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Yashwant Sinha: Shri Advani was present in Agra at that time. What are you saying.....(Interruption)

... (Interruptions)

Shri P.C. Chacko: Madam, please tell them not to disturb me. Even senior Members are disturbing me. What to do? ... (Interruptions)

I now come to the point about the composite dialogue; that is the main point which Shri Yashwant Sinha was explaining. About the dialogue, our position is that we are for the dialogue. As to when the composite dialogue should start, we have made it very clear. It should not be linked to the composite dialogue; that is what they have complained. Linked to the composite dialogue means what? Madam, one can have a simple reading and even a reading between the lines It is not that Shri Yashwant Sinha ji cannot understand this. He is distorting and misleading this House. Madam, what is happening is that whether there is dialogue or no dialogue, we want Pakistan to take action. That is the meaning of this sentence. We want Pakistan immediately to proceed with anti-terrorism actions. Against terrorism, any action cannot wait. Pakistan should take action against terrorism. So, we want Pakistan to take action against terrorism. India and Pakistan have jointly declared that every step will be taken by both the countries against terrorism. That means, the composite dialogue will take place at some point of time. We will decide the time; we have to decide and we will decide when we start the dialogue. At the same time, we are for the dialogue. This is made very clear.

Madam, you see the action taken by Pakistan. Pakistan initially refused to admit that it is their citizen who created the problem in Mumbai. Now, you see what they have done. Madam, there is a diplomatic success of the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister of this country. Why do they not admit that? Shri Yashwant Sinha is a former External Affairs Minister and also a former bureaucrat.

Madam, what is happening in this field? Pakistan has arrested five terrorists who had links with the Mumbai incident. Those terrorists are going to put to trial in Pakistan. We are not happy and we are not satisfied with that. Our Prime Minister has told Pakistan in unambiguous terms that you book everyone with this incident of Mumbai, until then we are not happy. Now, the process has started. Pakistan is on the defensive. Till now, they were saying that Pakistan has nothing to do with that. Now, they have admitted and said: "Yes, Kasab is a citizen of Pakistan. We have booked five of them. We are continuing with the inquiry." Whose success it is? Shri Yashwant Sinha should say that.

Madam, the then BJP Government could not even achieve one-tenth of what this Government is achieving today. Madam, at the same time, I still want to reiterate that India has got a position; India has got a very firm position. For your information, I want to say that India will go for the composite dialogue only when Pakistan is taking concrete action to book all the culprits behind the incident in Mumbai to the satisfaction of this country. It is our prerogative to fix the time for the composite dialogue, and we will decide that. Madam, there is some very interesting reference that is being made; a reference about Baluchistan. Shri Yashwant Sinha has said that a reference about Baluchistan has never been mentioned in the Statement in the history of this country. He said that after the discussion, the Statement has mentioned about Baluchistan, and this he said as if the whole sky is going to fall down; he wanted to know why Baluchistan has been mentioned in that.

Madam, Baluchistan is an internal affair of Pakistan. If Pakistan wants to mention about Baluchistan, why should we oppose it? I do not understand the logic of his argument. He also said that Kashmir should not be a part of an international dialogue and discussion.

It is our internal affair. We fought it like anything. I think, Yashwant Sinhaji also might have taken that line when he was holding responsible positions, that Pakistan cannot be mentioned in an international document. We did not allow Kashmir to be mentioned in this document. But Balochistan is mentioned in this document. Okay; it is Pakistan's internal affair. If it is brought into the text, it is not going to affect us in anyway. We have not contributed; we have not talked with them. It is not binding on us. If the Pakistani Prime Minister feels that he has some information about Balochistan, okay, let him give us the information. Let whatever information may come. We condemned terrorism in any form, in any part of the world perpetuated by anybody in unmistakable terms. That is the message of this text.

At the same time, merely mentioning Balochistan is not everything. Who is teaching us lessons on patriotism? I am sorry – before also I said it in this House – that the then External Affairs Minister of the BJP-led Government escorted a dreaded terrorist in a special flight to Kandahar... (Interruptions)

How soon do you forget this? Shahnawaz Hussainji, how can you forget it?... (Interruptions) The people would never forget it... (Interruptions) After the attack on our Parliament, you were celebrating in Agra! After you escorted a dreaded terrorist to Kandahar, now you are blaming the Congress! Please, we do not need any lesson from the BJP on patriotism.

Madam, it was raised as to why the hon. Prime Minister has agreed that Pakistan is an Islamic country. It is very interesting. According to the Constitution of Pakistan, Pakistan is an Islamic Republic... (Interruptions) You may agree; you may not agree but that is part of the history.

Yashwant Sinhaji, do not find fault with anything and everything. You are a senior person. We still respect you for certain things. Only you are a convert to BJP; you are not originally a BJP man... (Interruptions) How can you find fault with each and everything?

Madam, what is happening in the neighbourhood? Our relations with Bangladesh, our relations with Bhutan, our relations with Nepal, our relations with China, our relations with Sri Lanka are cordial. In and around — you were also sitting in that Chair — what is the position today? What we achieved in the last 365 days, you would not have achieved even one-tenth of that in 10 years time – I can challenge you... (Interruptions)

About the Statement, I am happy and I am thankful to you that you have raised this issue. You made an exercise in vain, doing a Padyatra from here to Rashtrapati Bhavan. Hon. Rashtrapatiji might be very much amused that you had made this representation. But you cannot befool the people of this country. You may try. You may still go on trying ... (Interruptions)

Shri Yashwant Sinha: Please, do not bring Rashtrapatiji here... (Interruptions)

Shri P.C. Chacko: But in the recent General Elections also, after having this verdict, if you are not convinced, nobody can help you. Even God cannot help you because you do not know the psychology of the people of this country... (Interruptions)

Madam, the core issue is that we want to see that Pakistan behaves as a responsible nation. We have made it very clear to Pakistan that Pakistan should behave properly. I cannot think of a better wording. They said about poor drafting, good drafting, etc. Those who were good draftsmen in the past can say that, but today, this is containing the exact warning that India should give to our neighbours when they are misbehaving. We want them to behave. That is the message given to them.

This Statement is only a routine thing. Indeed, in such international meetings, joint statements are being issued. There is nothing new in it. But we are happy that a Statement has come out. We are happy that Pakistan has agreed to their responsibility. We are happy that Pakistan has agreed—whether they would do it or not, is a matter to be seen... (Interruptions) Composite dialogue is an agenda for the future. We would decide the timing.

Action against terrorism is an immediate issue, which we have already said. They are making a hill out of a mole. They are trying to create a wrong impression. They are trying to distort. They are trying to create a misunderstanding among the people. I think, at this late hour, the BJP would realize their folly and they would withdraw from this kind of misleading campaign.

With these words, I conclude. Thank you.

Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav (Samajwadi Party): Madam speaker, thank you very much for allowing me to speak. Every country has its own foreign policy and supreme is national interest. The second point is that our foreign policy's success can be gauged by the number of countries we can count as friends. When the Honourable Prime Minister gives his statement, the truth will get clarified. But a message has gone across the country and to the common people and I would like to caution the Honourable Prime Minister that irrespective of the clarification he gives, a wrong message has gone to the people of the country that our dialogue with Pakistan was under pressure .....(interruption) I wanted to say some other word but okay, it was under pressure. We would definitely like to say that you have definitely deviated from the established foreign policy. Because either you should not have taken such a stiff stand when you said that there will be no dialogue till the terrorists who came to Indian, who were responsible for the Mumbai attacks on innocent people, till Pakistan does not punish those people responsible or catches them and hands them over to India. This is the demand of the entire country and of yourself as well.

The first question is why did the dialogue happen? When there was no action against the terrorists as it should have happened, when they were not handed over to you, then your statement in the first place should have been after clear thought. You have definitely reversed your stand. You have reversed your stand, the opposite has happened, the dialogue with Pakistan has happened. Why did this dialogue happen and on what condition has it happened?

The second point is how many mistakes will happen? Aren't we making a mistake in respect of our relations with Iran? Today we wish to caution you. Please go into history and see when Iran has not stood by India. When we were isolated in UNO, it was only Iran which stood by India. But did you talk with that Iran? In foreign policy, there are a lot of reasons which qualify for countries to become our friends. In your dialogue with America, did you have any discussion on Iran. America is waiting to attack Iran as it did with Iraq. Hence you are not less guilty. With respect to Iraq, we were very much in this house and we were strongly standing by them. Many leaders and opposition leaders had a discussion in Dada Somnath Chatterjee's chamber. At that time you could not criticise. You could not do anything else, but you could not criticise as well. Then you decided to use the term 'criticise' in Hindi and the lighter word 'deplore' in the English interpretation. You did not have the courage to say criticise. ....(Interruption) Sushma ji is not here, what can we say..... (interruption).....the word was interpreted

It is right that in the foreign policy the national interest is supreme but mistakes have happened. We would definitely like to say that these mistakes should not happen again and again. A big mistake has happened. That kind of mistake, whatever it is, however it is, as in Tashkent, we will not be able to tolerate. We lost our great Prime Minister. In what circumstances because of what illness, what shock he received, what apprehensions, what news went about the country, what wrong he could not tolerate or it was a natural mistake. In the same way, one thing I would like to say about Pakistan that if there is a war, India wins and if a dialogue happens, then India loses. We accept that in the dialogue which has got concluded, in that we have not won.

We should win in dialogue also. In the dialogue we did not win, we were left behind. You were left behind because in your previous foreign tour you had already said, committing in the G8 meeting of completion by the

Doha round of 2010 is against our established foreign policy. Our foreign policy which we keep repeating again and again that we are going away from our policy of non-alignment. The policy of non-alignment was decided after independence and was proposed by Nehru ji and a lot of prominent leaders had a hand in it. Our non-alignment policy had given a lot of confidence and hope to many countries of the world that were backward, poor, small, that India's non-alignment policy will only help them. This had resulted in a kind of secure feeling among the small and weak countries of the world. Honourable prime Minister, we definitely have to think about where we are standing today and where do we want to go. Where are we standing now and where do we want to go. You have to give a serious thought to it. We all know that you have a lot of experience on foreign policy. You have worked on many aspects of foreign policy. You have also been a foreign minister. Apart from this you have many other experiences which I would not like to enumerate now but based on that experience, you have some weakness somewhere as well. How you will put right this message that has been sent out to the Indian population is for you to see. . we are also not satisfied. We would like to say that before this Shri Kamal Nath's and Shri Jaitley's stand was correct in some ways. It must be accepted Shri Jaswant Singh who was a foreign minister he is with us. The stand taken by Shri Jaitley and Shri Kamal Nath, why wasn't a stand like that taken, what was the reason for the foreign minister to go. The good work that has been done by Shri Kamal Nath, I will not give a long talk about that.....(Interruption) I am talking about both of them, Shri Arun Jaitley and Shri Kamal Nath, their stand was good. But you also did not allow a stand to be taken. ....(Interruption) DMK's Foreign minister Shri Maran is not here now. He had taken a strong stand and then it became known that he received a telephone call from your office.....(Interruption) Honourable Mr. Joshi, you were a minister. The stand taken by Mr. Maran was a good stand, for farmers, for farming, for production but then a telephone call was made from here and he had to soften his stand. Mistakes are happening but then mistakes made by people in power are more costly. It is right that foreign policy works only with consensus. It is in the interest of the country and national interest is supreme. Relations are not supreme, country is supreme. We can have good relations with anybody but when it comes to country, the country comes first. The public announcements made by Pakistan President Shri Zardari have come out in the media. You had taken a clear stand that until Pakistan takes action on terrorism, until they dismantle the terrorist camps on their soil, we will not have any dialogue with Pakistan. Then why did we have dialogue with Pakistan. What was the reason. It will be wonderful if you can clarify this. In the recent meeting of non-aligned countries in sharm al-Sheikh, the joint statement that was issued, there have been two mistakes from our side. In the interest of our country, I accept two mistakes because terrorism has been delinked from your dialogue. The straight interpretation is that whatever terrorist activities Pakistan pursues, no dialogue happens.

Terrorism was the first issue. Our country has suffered the biggest insult in the form of terrorism. Pakistani terrorists come and attack Mumbai. Out of that one terrorist is caught, you have got all the secrets from him, what bigger proof can you get and what bigger and clearer picture can you get. When one terrorist has been caught, you have got all the information, then you should tell this house, what you have done. The plan was made where? Who were the conspirationalists? Where else did they want to attack? How much more of loss did they want to inflict on India? The Parliament has been attacked, where else did they want to attack? But Pakistan has not learnt its lesson. How much ever socialist we maybe, we have to maintain friendships with our neighbours and other countries, friendship is necessary. As I said before friendship is necessary, we must have the maximum number of friends, less enemies, that shows the success of politics as well as our foreign policy. So how many friends have we made? I said that day as well, friendship is separate and relationship is separate. You must keep this in mind. How many friends do you have in your neighbours? You please tell me how many of our neighbours are our friends, Pakistan there is no question, china is not your friend, our dependent neighbour Nepal is also not. I had recently gone for four days to Nepal, the Nepalese population is with us but still we are not able to count them as friends. Sri Lanka was with us during our worst times, it stood with us during the 1962 war. But today can we count it as among our friends. It is not a friend, relations can be good. Please understand the difference between friendship and good relations. I would like the Prime minister or the Foreign Minister to name one country in the whole world whom we can count as a friend and whom we can understand. We are also in politics, we have to speak, we have to go places, our party is also asked questions, we should also be able to answer that this country is our friend. We have reached a position today where India does not have any friend. Relations can be good for how long and how much, that is a separate issue but today India doesn't have any friends. So that is why I would like to say that to make our foreign policy successful we should make more and more friends. If India does not make friends now, when will she make. During Indira Gandhi's times, America threatened us by sending their fleet but Indiraji did not bow down. She refused them even though India was not so strong then. Today India is strong in every way, stronger than 1970-71, many times stronger, but why don't we have the courage today? Honourable Prime Minister, if we have to save the country's respect and pride, make our country strong, then will power, determination and courage are the three things required. But none of these three qualities are visible today. The resolve used to be there but now that has also gone. Will power is also not visible and so has the courage disappeared. How can Pakistan dare to trouble us. We want Pakistan's friendship, we consider them our younger brother but Pakistan is crossing its limits. We are bigger than them in many ways, our army is bigger, territory is bigger and our economic conditions are also better, and still terrorists from there dare to come and attack Mumbai. They dare to attack our parliament, they can attack us anywhere they want? How dare they? What is the reason for this? Capture Kargil, go and sit there for one year, make arrangements for their food, how can they dare to this, why are they not scared of us? From where are our neighbouring countries getting the strength to attack us, to become our enemies, and have enmity with us, how are they daring to do these things? Why aren't they scared? And for this I have said we need, will power, determination and courage. You have to give serious thought to this. This is in the country's interest.

As far as signing is concerned, it is right that Pakistan has benefited from this worldwide discussion and India is at a loss. If you do not take the opposition into confidence, then what will happen? When Bangladesh separated from Pakistan to become an independent country, then who was sent to keep India's perspective in front of the world. At that time Jaiprakash ji was sent to present India's point of view that so many people are coming to India from Bangladesh as refugees. How do we feed them, where do we put them up? At that time Mr. Jaiprakash had presented India's point of view to the world. We had a lot of differences with Jaiprakash ji at that time. We had been troubled a lot and the emergency had also been declared. Everything Mrs. Indira Gandhi did but on this issue, I praise Mrs. Gandhi, I remember that on this issue, Mrs. Gandhi sent Jaiprakash ji to the world forum. In this respect, she was unparalleled. Jaiprakash ji made the world opinion in our favour and then Indira Gandhi attacked Pakistan. And it was then that Bangladesh became a separate country. If Pakistan broke up, will Pakistan forget it easily. You broke up Pakistan, they can never forget it. If you become its friend, we will immediately garland you. That is the right thing, it is the question of the country. We can keep on playing politics, but who will have the big name in politics, the person who does some big work, something magical. You say that we gave our support but support we gave because of you. You were continuously fighting with us. Just now honourable sister fought with me saying that we supported. I said that if you bring down the government, then today also we will support, we will not let the government fall. But I have not compromised with any of my policies and ideals. If you had changed your policies, then the circumstances would not be like this. Your leader is still talking about Mandir-Masjid, where is hunger, where is employment, where is farming, where is the farmer, where is trade, industry, what is the plan of action, is the foreign policy being discussed, where is India but you are still seeing mandir-masjid. Who is bothered about Mandir-Masjid? We both did not have a fight on mandir-Masjid, we were spectators. Here everybody was a spectator, it must be remembered, and Joshi ji and me were fighting. We remember those days. I am remembering those days because for 11 days I was not allowed to sleep even for one hour, only then we could protect the masjid. But you are not thinking beyond the mandir-masjid. There is no will power or determination at all.

Our army is strong, our agriculture is strong, we are strong in all fields. I salute the people of Punjab, today they are playing a good role in the border. There is no disturbance of any kind there. There is disturbance and hatred in the borders of many other states but the Punjab border is peaceful. This is a positive sign for the country and for us. Whenever there is an attack on us or there is some disturbance, the effect is borne by Punjab. But today Punjab is peaceful and this is good for us. I don't want to name those provinces, they will feel bad, they have differences amongst themselves.....(Interruption) There are some things I wanted to say and I have said them. The points raised by Shri Yashwant Sinha, I do not want to repeat them. But I do want to say the Honourable Prime Minister, you are an experienced man, I have said that before, but with confidence I would like to say one thing that with your pressure nobody will be able to do anything, the people are with you, the army is strong, nobody has the courage, this signature that you have gone and done, throw it in the garbage, I don't have anything else to say.

Shri Sharad Yadav (Janata Dal - United): Madam, after the 26/11 attacks, there have been statements on that from both sides whether it was from the Home Minister, Defence Minister or the Foreign Minister. The number of statements that have been given from this side, an equal number of statements have come from the Pakistan as well. In these there is the statement of the Prime Minister as well. Under the circumstances, you had taken your position that we will not have any dialogue till cross-border terrorism is ended. This we did not decide, this was decided by your council of ministers. I would like to point out that it is now 62 years and this sequence continues. And I do not agree that it is in the hands of the government. The way history divided the countries, excluding Mahatma Gandhi, we do not need to go into history, the way we are standing, I am not saying that there should be a war between India and Pakistan. The situation was first under your control but now it is not. When it was the traditional army, we used to win, the same situation does not prevail today. There have been so many statements on 26/11, and they have not been given by one person. From your government side, a lot of officers have given, the prime minister has given. From the statement of Mr. Gilani and our prime minister, it has been decided that terrorism and dialogue can both go along side by side. You agreed and he agreed, the question is not that. You bring out a state of insanity in the country, sometimes I say insanity should be there followed by a well thought out agitation. Events happen and we flow with those events. Today the situation is that you statement, it is a joint statement. Nuclear deal does not seem far away, the nuclear deal has been enumerated in great detail, I will not give my views on that since I have very less time. Not only the government but everybody excluding the communist parties have given their statements. In the end even Mulayam Singh Yadav held a convention in Lucknow against the nuclear deal and after that support was also given.

Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav: We will reply on Monday

Madam Chairperson: Please do not talk amongst yourselves.

Shri Sharad Yadav: There was a promise to give electricity. I do not know what was decided between the two of you but according to the nuclear deal, the ministers of your government as well as your government were united.

More than you, your full party was engaged in war. The leader of the Congress Party was also a participant. With full confidence like you both play volleyball, you were scoring goals. But in this matter I am not saying that the congress Party and you.....(interruption).. I cannot hear what you are saying.....(interruption)....Football has goal.....(Interruption) I changed the word. I am not such a big player.....(interruption)

Hockey has goals and so the party and the government were repeatedly scoring goals and after this statement, the party spokesman, I see Doordarshan, I see less of other channels but in Doordarshan I saw that all your spokesmen were hiding instead of giving replies. That is the difference, this speaks for itself that your statement has put you also in a quandary at some level. You also feel that the step that you have taken is not right for the country. Now Baluchistan, in our childhood we had read the story of kabuliwallah, and Baluchistan, Frontier Gandhi was from there. The thing that we facing singlehandedly, there was one man with Mahatma Gandhi, Frontier Gandhi, Abdul Ghaffar Khan. When I came into this world, when I was university president, if there was a place where he was welcomed the most, it was in our university. He was one man from Baluchistan who during India's independence struggle, it is confirmed by people from both sides, that after Gandhi he was one of the couple of people who could be named for giving shape to India's independence and that was Frontier Gandhi. He was against the partition of the country, he said you are throwing Baluchistan to the wolves.....(Interruption) Faluchistan is bordering Baluchistan.....(Interruption) He had his influence there as well. The people who participated in the agitation were from here. If you meddle with the geography, then I am not the only one talking about geography.....(Interruption) Baluchistan, Aktulistan, they are all intermingled areas and Frontier Gandhi had his influence in all these areas, the whole frontier, the whole of north east. You mentioned it. You were saying, P.C.Chacko was saying that this is not such a big issue. That is a strange statement to make. In 60 years it has not been mentioned and now that it has been mentioned it is a straight issue that our feelings in this country and those of the people in Faluchistan or Baluchistan or the whole afghan area, there are some natural human feelings that are exchanged between us. Without mention, without clarifying, they feel that we are their friends and we feel that they are our friends. It is never mentioned. We have mentioned it now. Even if the mention is purely namesake, after this mention, your government's officers, we are not saying this, Yashwant Sinha is not saying this, Mulayam Singh Yadav is not saying this, your government's officers who were at Sharm-el-sheikh, they are saying that the statement, there has been some bad drafting.

The best part is that they are getting salaries from the government for this only, for this only you are officers and when the drafting took place, you are coming and telling that the drafting was wrong, bad drafting. That is shocking.....(Interruption) Foreign minister is there, foreign secretary is there. The foreign secretary can come and say such a thing and he is still continuing? Either you are right or they are right. India has a right to know whether it was bad drafting or right drafting, whether it was right or wrong. The Indian government cannot have two tongues. One which the officers speak and one which the prime minister speaks, in this way two mouths are not acceptable. You are quiet, you have not taken any action on this. The country is in two mind. The country can feel that something wrong has happened. You cannot feel it but the country can feel it. The country can feel it because the statement has two voices, two tongues. Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav, till the country has two tongues or two voices, it cannot stand up to anybody. India's helplessness is going to increase. Poverty and bankruptcy will be staring at us. There will be plundering everywhere till the country becomes strong, till two voices speak .....(interruption) you were saying that the minister of state is a big diplomat. Who listens to the UNO? I remember that when they were coming to India, I was a minister in Atal Behari Vajpayee's government. UNO's Secretary, South Africa or Ghana's Kofi Annan wanted to come here and the government here was indifferent. I should not say this. I said that he wants to come, the United Nations was standing and Iraq and Afghanistan got attacked. The minister has been in the UNO and after being there, he lost and has come here. I don't accept, he is saying this is no treaty between two countries, it is not an agreement. Yes, I agree there is weakness on the part of Pakistan as they cannot make out whether President Zardari is stronger or Prime Minister Gilani. But I accept Mr. Gilani's cleverness that he was able to go to sharm-el-sheikh and get a statement like this with you and go back to Pakistan and shout, we have won, we have won. Here we have UPA, Congress Party, you are definitely standing but there is no coordination of language or content between the two. Between the two of you, there is no common perception, common objective and then you say there is no problem. The way statements were being given after 26/11 from all sides, it is a wonder that whoever was a minister was giving a statement, the defence minister was speaking, the foreign minister was speaking and were trying for some kind of balance. You are giving one statement after another and then you say that terrorism and dialogue have no linkage. It is a wonder. I agree there is a linkage. If only you had said with conviction that till terrorism is not stopped, we will not have any dialogue with you. But you have reversed your stand. It is not long since 26/11, not much time has passed. The situation there, discussions will go on and terrorism medley from there to here will also continue. On this subject Shri Yashwant Sinha and other honourable members have already spoken .....(Interruption)

Shri Jagdambika Pal: After 13 December 2001, the bus service was stopped, the train service was stopped, the high commissioner was called back but then how did the dialogue start again? .....(Interruption)

Madam Chairperson: *Please sit down
(Interruption)*

Madam Chairperson: Except for Shri Sharad Yadav, no other person's comments will go on record. ....(interruption) (Proceedings not included in narrative)

Madam Chairperson : *Please sit down
(Interruption)*

Shri Sharad Yadav: Shri Jagdambika Pal, I have understood your point. You are saying that after the attack on parliament we had stopped the bus service.....(Interruption)

Shri Jagdambika Pal (Congress): You called back the High Commissioner and then you started talks, what was the reason for that?

Shri Sharad Yadav (Janata Dal – United): Madam Chairperson, I do not want to comment at length on his point because if we are sitting here, then why are you sitting there. Till when will you hide your own mistakes by talking about past history. ....(Interruption) Till when will you hide your own wrongdoings and mistakes? Today every minister stands up....(Interruption) I have understood your point. Today every minister stands up and says what happened in the last NDA government, NDA government did this mistake, NDA government did that mistake. Okay brother, it is okay, if we made a mistake, that is why we are sitting here. We have made some mistake. We are sitting here, it does not mean that we should go away from the House. What you are saying means that after the attack on the parliament, if we reopened the bus service, the context was different. If you want to debate on that issue, please bring it up, we will definitely debate the issue. We are also saying that if some mistake was made, then a person like us will also accept it. The question is simple, I am saying that the environment that you had created after 26/11 in the country and then suddenly you went totally in reverse gear. I am saying that the whole country is disillusioned. Whether anybody tells you or not, but I am telling you that all those people who after 26/11 were singing your praises or singing songs, ringing bells, playing the tabla or the harmonium, that stage has gone out of tune now. Each one is playing a separate tune now. Somebody is playing the tabla, somebody is playing the sarangi and somebody is playing the mridang. The tone of each person is different. All the people who were before playing together in a synchronised manner are all playing now in different tones. Each person's tone has become different. It did not happen just there, not in the country, not in the media, not in the papers, even in your government, the tones are all different. The party is silent, the party says the government will speak, give the right answer. But they spoke after a very long time. The Prime Minister must have said what is this happening and the back and forth statements reached this point. I do not want to go into it in detail, I don't go into the problem of end user. I don't want to go into the details of the status of India-Pakistan relations. But we partitioned our country and after dividing it up, we spend almost 30-40% of our money on the army and so do they. And then after that we take a stand in front of the public with conviction, position ourselves and then move from that position. We take a stand but that stand does not have any meaning because we are not trying to do anything in moving towards that resolve.

Madam, I would like to reiterate that in making the present India-Pakistan relations, the government has not changed. It was your government before and the same government remains. When the circumstances have not changed, when the Mumbai attack happened, you had taken the entire country into confidence through the government. That day in Mumbai when candles were being lit, I wish somebody had been writing down what was being said, they wanted the resignation of the chief minister. I think those people would not have been even going for voting, all those people who had congregated there with whom you added your voice as well. You must have seen and judged the situation. You are saying that without dialogue nothing can happen. If there is truth in this, then the situation you had created in the country after 26/11, we were against that then and we are against it now.

You were in the government, it was your party, then why did you create this agitation. And then after the agitation, why are you starting this dialogue. Pakistan is continuing with its terrorist activities, there is no let up on that. I am requesting the Prime Minister to make the foreign policy of the country stronger. I have met the Prime Minister with regard to the Nepal condition two times. We have not gone much to any foreign countries. I myself have been here for 35 years. I do not want to go to foreign countries because our own country has a lot of problems and I don't get time from the problems in our own country. The poor of our country are in discomfort and in problems but they are also sleeping. I did not go anywhere. I only know that a country's foreign policy is okay only when.....(Interruption) Lal Singh ji, why did you sit at the back and talk. Why don't you say what you want, I will reply. Please don't do this.

Madam Chairperson: – Shri Yadav, Please address the chair

Shri Sharad Yadav: Madam chairperson, I am requesting that they should not do such a thing. Teasing is allowed in parliament. I was only asking Shri Jagadambika pal ji that if he wanted to ask anything.

Madam Chairperson – Please maintain the peace.

Shri Sharad Yadav: Madam chairperson, this is not right. When they speak from the back, it resounds in the whole hall. If somebody speaks like this, then there is confusion and we get derailed. Madam Chairperson, I am submitting that the foreign policy of this country has been going forward with a national consensus for the last 62 years. It might be so in our talks, in our debates we either disagree with you or agree with you but you finish up everything and then come to the house. For the last 15-20 years, the world economy is open. The world has changed. I am not saying that you are so strong. A country is only as strong as its people. A Chinese wherever he goes, his foreign policy is strong. They don't have poverty like ours as we are having daylight robbery. There is a difference in their poverty and ours. The straight point is that there should be consensus on foreign policy. If you so wanted, you could have called the leader of the opposition, Shri Advani and talked to him, did you? Congress has got the people's support, that should have increased your courage, your mind and heart should have been much larger. The foreign policy of a country is always by consensus. I am saying this because after the Mumbai attacks, there was a national consensus which had been formed in the country that after the attack we should not have a dialogue with Pakistan will terrorist activities are not stopped in our country. It would have been okay if you had said this before or even now. Hence my humble request is that foreign policy should be by consensus whether it is your Prime Minister or from our party. Even our party was there for 10-11 months and then for five years. Congress Party has been in power for a longer period. Congress Party has had a bigger contribution to foreign policy. The national consensus that existed previously has now been split. The consensus is getting converted to an argument now. Today, whether it is Yashwant Sinha or Mulayam Singh Yadav or me, we are all telling you the same thing that the national consensus is breaking down. And if foreign policy gets split, then you feel bad whether it is your party or ours.

You feel bad because presently we are facing all kinds of problems and situations. Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav said the right thing when he said that we don't have friendly relations with any of our neighbouring countries. We had relations but they are not that of friendship, not from the heart and if relations are not from the heart, it does not grow or go ahead. When we got independence, we were hiding behind Russia's sleeve. And now America. I am not saying that we should not be friendly with America but we have to be careful that this friendship should be keeping our national interest in mind and not under pressure. We can do many things and seeing our country's population, we are not in such a bad state, we are not lagging behind too much. China has gone ahead by 7-8 times but our situation is not bad. If you chart a path with conviction, we are not separate from you, we are with you but on this point, madam, I wish to reiterate that I am not in agreement with the government. I am not against dialogue but what use is dialogue when it is always our poor people who keep dying from terrorist activities inflicted on them. One more point that I would like to add is that the whole world opinion had been formed, the whole world had felt the Mumbai attack and it was gut wrenching to the whole world. You had also taken the world opinion a little way ahead but then your joint statement in Sharm-el-sheikh has hurt that opinion. The world opinion that had formed in our favour is now floundering. America's interest is connected with this. Pakistan's army and their area of the SWAT valley where the Radio Mullah stays. Swat valley is the place where American and Pakistani forces are fighting together.

They will talk only in their own interest. I would like to tell you that America will talk and act not keeping our interest in mind but their own interest. Our leaning towards America, I am saying this after taking a lot of things into consideration, when Mr. Bush came, then his sniffer dogs went even to Mahatma Gandhi's memorial.

Madam, the we feel that America is putting pressure on us because of their own interests. The foreign policy that we had with national consensus, the consensus with which we have been running our country's foreign policy for 62 years in which there is no separate government, treasury bench or opposition. Please get back this consensus again and this will take our country forward again in the right direction. We feel that the work is half-done and that is why the national consensus has got broken or split. Thank you.

The Prime Minister (Dr. Manmohan Singh): Madam, Speaker, I am very grateful to Shri Yashwant Sinha, Shri Mulayam Singhji, Shri Sharad Yadavji for their comments on the Joint Statement that was issued after Sharm-el-Sheikh and also for what I said in the G-8 meetings in Italy. I will cover all the points and clarify all the issues. Madam Speaker, as I have said many times before, we cannot wish away the fact that Pakistan is our neighbour. We should be good neighbours. If we live in peace, as good neighbours do, both of us can focus our energies on many problems that confront our people, our acute poverty which afflicts millions and millions of people in South Asia. If there is cooperation between us, and not conflict, vast opportunities will open up for trade, travel and development that will create prosperity in both countries. It is, therefore, in our vital interest to make sincere efforts to live in peace with Pakistan. But despite the best of intentions, we cannot move forward if terrorist attacks launched from Pakistani soil continue to kill and injure our citizens, here and abroad. That is the national position and I stand by that. Madam, I have said time and again and I repeat it right now again. It is impossible for any Government in India to work towards full normalisation of relations with Pakistan unless the Government of Pakistan fulfils, in letter and spirit, its commitment not to allow its territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India. This was a commitment, as my friend, Shri Yashwant Sinha mentioned, made to my distinguished predecessor, Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee, and it has been repeated to me in every meeting I have had with the Pakistani leadership. The people of India expect these assurances to be honoured and this Government recognises that as the common national consensus.

Madam, the attack on Mumbai last November outraged our nation and cast a deep shadow over our relation with Pakistan. The reality and the horror of it were brought into Indian homes over three traumatic days that still haunt us. The people of India demand that this must never happen again. Over the past seven months, we followed a policy, using all effective bilateral and multilateral instruments at our command, to ensure that Pakistan acts, with credibility and sincerity, as we would expect of any civilized nation. Soon after the attacks, the United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Lashkar-e-Toiba and its front organisations, including the Jamaat-ud-Dawa. It also imposed sanctions on four individuals connected with the organisation, including one of the masterminds behind the Mumbai attacks, Zaki-ur-Rehman Lakhvi.

We exercised great restraint under very difficult circumstances but made it clear that Pakistan must act. On 5th January, 2009, we handed over to Pakistan the details of the links to Pakistan that were revealed by our investigators. Some action followed and Pakistan formally responded to us on two occasions regarding the progress of their own investigations in February 2009 and then two days before my departure for Paris and Sharm-El-Sheikh.

The latest dossier is a 34-page document that gives the details of the planning and sequence of events, details of the investigations carried out by the Special Federal Investigation Agency Team of Pakistan, a copy of the FIR lodged, and the details and photographs of the accused in custody and those declared as proclaimed offenders. It provides details of the communication networks used, financing of the operation and seizures made in Pakistan, including maps, life boats, literatures on navigational training, intelligence manuals, back packs, etc. This is Pakistan's dossier supplied to us. It states that the investigation has established beyond doubt that Lashkar-e-taiba activists conspired, financed and executed the attacks. Five of the accused have been arrested, including Zaki-ur- Rehman Lakhvi and Zarar Shah; and thirteen others have been declared proclaimed offenders. A charge sheet has since been filed against them under Pakistan's Anti Terrorist Act, and other relevant laws. We have been told that the investigations are nearly complete and that a trial will now proceed. We have also been asked for some further information and we will provide this shortly. This, Madam Speaker, is the first time that Pakistan has ever formally briefed us on the results of the investigation into a terrorist attack in India. It has never happened before. This, I repeat, is the first time. It is also the first time that they have admitted that their nationals and a terrorist organisation based in Pakistan carried out a ghastly terrorist attack in India. Madam Speaker, the reality is that this is far more than the NDA Government was ever able to extract from Pakistan, despite all their tall talks. This is true of the entire duration of the NDA regime. They were never able to get Pakistan to admit what they have admitted now. So, I say with all respect to Shri Yashwant Sinha, that the UPA Government needs no lessons from the Opposition on how to conduct foreign affairs or secure our nation against terrorist threats. Madam Speaker, while noting the steps Pakistan has taken, I have to say that, they do not go far enough. We hope that the trial will make quick progress and that exemplary punishment will be meted out to those who committed this horrific crime against humanity. We need evidence that action is being taken to outlaw, disarm, and shut down the terrorist groups and their front organisations that still operate on Pakistani soil and which continue to pose a grave threat to our country.

Madam Speaker, in the final analysis the reality is that despite all the friends that we may have – and we wish to make as many friends, as Shri Mulayam Singh ji said, as possible – the harsh reality of the modern world power structure is such that when it comes to matters relating to our internal security and defence, we will have to depend on ourselves. Self-help is the best help. There is no substitute to strengthening our defence capabilities, our national security structure and our emergency response mechanism. I wish to assure the House that the Government is giving these matters the highest priority and attention.

Several important steps have been taken to modernise, rationalise and strengthen our Defence security and intelligence apparatus. A detailed plan to address internal security challenges is being implemented in a time-bound manner. The Government is maintaining utmost vigilance in the area of internal security. Measures have been taken to ensure enhanced information and intelligence sharing on a real time basis. The policy of zero tolerance towards terrorism, from whatever sources it originates, has been put in place. Madam, in the area of Defence, steps are underway to substantially improve our coastal and maritime security. Large acquisitions of major weapon systems and platforms have been approved for the modernisation of our Army, Navy and Air Force. There has been a special focus to improve the welfare of the Armed Forces personnel. We will spare no effort and no expense to defend our nation against any threat to our sovereignty, unity and integrity. This is the sacred and bounden duty of any Government in this great country.

Madam, Speaker, but we do not dilute our positions or our resolve to defeat terrorism by talking to any country. Other major powers affected by Pakistan based terrorism are also engaging with Pakistan. Unless we talk directly to Pakistan, we will have to rely on third parties to do so. This I submit to this august House that particular route has very severe limitations as to its effectiveness and for the longer term view of what South Asia should be, the growing involvement of our foreign powers in the affairs of South Asia is not something to our liking. I say, therefore, with strength and conviction that dialogue and engagement is the best way forward. This has been the history of our relations with Pakistan over the last decade.

Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee took a decision of political courage to visit Lahore in 1999. Then came Kargil and the hijacking of an Indian Airlines plane to Kandahar. Yet, he invited General Musharraf to Agra and again tried to make peace. The nation witnessed the terrible attack on Parliament in 2001. There followed an extremely difficult phase in our relationship. The Armed Forces of the two countries stood fully mobilized. But to his great credit, Shri Vajpayee was not deterred, as a statesman should not be. In 2004, he went to Islamabad, where a Joint Statement was issued that set out a vision for a cooperative relationship. I must remind the House that the Opposition Parties supported those bold steps. I for one share Shri Vajpayee's vision and I have also felt his frustration in dealing with Pakistan.

In my meetings with the President Zardari in Yekaterinburg and with the Prime Minister Gilani in Sharm-El-Sheikh, I conveyed in the strongest possible terms our concerns and expectations. I conveyed to them the deep anger and hurt of the people of India due to the persistence of terrorist attacks on our people. I told them that the operations of all terrorist groups that threaten India must end permanently. I urged them to make no distinctions between different terrorists organisations.

I said that it was not enough to say that Pakistan is itself a victim of terrorism. They must show the same political will and take the same strong and sustained action against terrorist the groups operating on their eastern border as they now seem to be taking against the groups on their western border. Both President Zardari and Prime Minister Gilani assured me that the Pakistan Government was serious and that effective action would be taken against the perpetrators of the Mumbai carnage.

Shri Yashwant Sinha asked me what was the change between my meeting with President Zardari and later my meeting with Prime Minister Gilani. In-between came the dossier which showed progress was not adequate progress of the type that I had already indicated. He asked me: "Will you trust Pakistan?" Let me say that in the affairs of two neighbours, the best approach is, what the late President Reagan once said: "trust but verify." We have no other way of moving forward unless we want to go to war. I was told by both President Zardari and Prime Minister Gilani that Mumbai was the work of non-State actors. I said that this gave little satisfaction to us and that it was the duty of their Government to ensure that such acts were not perpetrated from their territory. I told them that another attack of this kind would put an intolerable strain on our relationship and that they must take all possible measures to prevent a recurrence. Madam Speaker, after I returned from Sharm-el-Sheikh, I made a Statement in Parliament which clarified and elaborated not just the Joint Statement issued following my meeting with Prime Minister Gilani but also what we discussed. I wish to reiterate that the President and the Prime Minister of Pakistan know, after our recent meetings, that we can have a meaningful dialogue with Pakistan only if they fulfil their commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India. This message was repeated when the Foreign Ministers and the Foreign Secretaries met. I stand by what I have said in Parliament - that there has been no dilution of our position in this regard.

An interpretation has been sought to be given that the Statement says that we will continue to engage in a composite dialogue whether Pakistan takes action against terrorism or not. This is not correct. The Joint Statement emphasised that action on terrorism cannot be linked to dialogue. Pakistan knows very well that with terrorism being such a mortal and global threat, no civilised country can set terms and conditions for rooting it out. It is an absolute and compelling imperative that cannot be dependent on resumption of the composite dialogue. In the Joint Statement itself, the two sides have agreed to share real-time, credible and actionable information on any future terrorist threats.

Madam Speaker, when I spoke to Prime Minister Gilani about terrorism from Pakistan, he mentioned to me that many Pakistanis thought that India meddled in Balochistan. I told him that we have no interest whatsoever in destabilising Pakistan nor do we harbour any ill intent towards Pakistan. We believe that a stable, peaceful and prosperous Pakistan living in peace with its neighbours is in India's own interest. I told him then and I say it here again that we are not afraid of discussing any issue of concern between the two countries. If there are any misgivings, we are willing to discuss them and remove them. I said to him, „I had been told by the leadership of Pakistan several times that Indian Consulates in Afghanistan were involved in activities against Pakistan, this is totally false, we have had Consulates in Kandahar and Jalalabad for 60 years, our Consulates perform normal diplomatic functions and are assisting in the reconstruction of Afghanistan where we have a large aid programme that is benefiting the common people of Afghanistan, but we are willing to discuss all these issues because we know that we are doing nothing wrong. I told Prime Minister Gilani that our conduct is an open book. If Pakistan has any evidence – and they have not given me any evidence, no dossier was ever supplied – we are willing to look at it because we have nothing to hide.

Madam Speaker, I sincerely believe that it is as much in Pakistan's interest as it is in ours to strive to make peace. Pakistan must defeat terrorism before being consumed by it. I believe the current leadership there understands that. It may not be very strong, but the impression that I have is that the current leadership understands the need for action. I was told by their parliamentarians who accompanied Prime Minister Gilani that there is now a political consensus in Pakistan against terrorism. That should strengthen the hands of its leadership in taking the hard decisions that will be needed to destroy terrorism and its sponsors in their country. Madam Speaker, our objective, as I said at the outset, must be a permanent peace with Pakistan where we are bound together by a shared future and a common prosperity. I believe that there is a large constituency for peace in both countries. The majority of people in both countries want an honourable settlement of the problems between us that have festered far too long and want to set aside the animosities of the past. We know this, but in the past there have been hurdles in a consistent pursuit of this path. As a result, the enemies of peace have flourished. They want to make our alienation permanent, the distance between our two countries an unbridgeable divide. In the interest of our people and the interest of prosperity and peace of South Asia, we must not let this happen. This is why I hope and pray that the leadership in Pakistan will have the strength and the courage to defeat those who want to destroy not just peace between India and Pakistan, but the future of South Asia. As I have said before, if they show that strength and that courage, we will meet them more than half the way.

There are uncertainties on the horizon. I cannot predict the future. But, as I said, in dealing with our neighbour, - two nuclear powers – the only way forward is to begin to trust each other despite all that has happened in the past, not trust blindly, but trust and verify.

For the present, what is it that we have agreed? People have been saying that we have broken the national consensus. I simply refuse to believe that we have broken any national consensus not to tolerate terrorism and that Pakistan has to act and act effectively on terrorism before there can be a dialogue, leave aside the Composite Dialogue, which is a comprehensive dialogue covering all areas of disagreement or concerns of the two countries. For the present, all that we have agreed is that the two Foreign Secretaries will meet. The two Foreign Secretaries have been meeting even before the Joint Statement. Further, we have agreed that the two Foreign Ministers will meet on the sidelines of the General Assembly. The two Foreign Ministers have been meeting even before the Statement was issued. They met recently in Trieste. I met President Zardari in Russia. I met Prime Minister Gilani even before this Statement. So, by an operational term all that we have agreed is that there will be a meeting of Foreign Secretaries, as often as necessary, followed by a meeting of the two Foreign Ministers on the sidelines of the General Assembly. Does it involve a surrender of any position? Does it involve a weakening of a position? As neighbours, I sincerely believe that it is our obligation to keep channels of communication open, to look down what is happening in the world today. America and Iran were sworn enemies for 30 years. They feel compelled to enter into dialogue. This is happening all over the world and unless we want to go to war with Pakistan, there is no other way but to go step by step; trust but verify is the only possible way of dealing with Pakistan. Madam, I now come to three other issues which hon. Yashwant Sinha Ji has raised. One relates to the end-use monitoring arrangement we have made with the United States for Defence purchase. All Governments, Madam, including our Government, are particular about end-uses to which exported Defence equipment and technologies are put to and for preventing them from falling into wrong hands. Since the late 1990s, the Governments of India and the United States have entered into end-use monitoring arrangement for the import of US high-technology Defence equipment and supplies. These were negotiated before this Agreement in each case by successive Governments of India. The Government has only accepted those arrangements which are fully in consonance with our sovereignty and dignity.

What we have now agreed with the United States is a generic formulation which will apply to future such supplies that India chooses to undertake. By agreeing to generic formulation, we have introduced an element of predictability in what is otherwise an ad-hoc case by case negotiation in each case.

I should add that we need access to all technologies available in the world for the modernisation of our Defence forces. The threats to our country are growing and we need to have the capability to deal with them and to be ahead of them. Our Armed Forces are entitled to the best possible equipment available anywhere in the world. It is also in our interest, therefore, to diversify to the maximum extent possible the sources of our imports of Defence items and equipment.

You have my assurance, Madam, and through you I wish to convey this to this august House that our Government has taken all precautions to ensure an outcome that guarantees our sovereignty and national interest. Nothing in the text that has been agreed to compromises India's sovereignty.

There is no provision – I repeat, there is no provision – for any unilateral action by the United States side with regard to inspection or related matters. India has the sovereign right to jointly decide, including through joint consultations, the verification procedure. Any verification has to follow a request; it has to be on a mutually-acceptable date and at a mutually acceptable venue. There is no provision for on-site inspections or granting of access to any military site or sensitive areas. This is the position with regard to end-use monitoring.

Madam Speaker, Shri Yashwant Sinha brought up the issue of climate change as if we have changed goal-posts. There is nothing of that sort. There was a meeting in Italy along with the G-8 meeting of major economies of the world. India was invited to that meeting where 17 other countries were present. I should, however, mention that the Major Economic Forum Declaration adopted at L'Aquila is not a declaration of Climate Change policy by India, nor is it a bilateral declaration between India and another country or a group of countries. It is a declaration that represents a shared view among 17 developed and developing countries, the latter category including China, South Africa, Brazil, Indonesia, and Mexico. Therefore, the formulations are necessarily generally worded to reflect different approaches and positions of a fairly diverse group of countries. It has been argued in some quarters that the reference in the Declaration to a scientific view that global temperature increase should not exceed two degrees centigrade, represents a significant shift in India's position on climate change, and that it may oblige us to accept emission reduction targets. This is one-sided and misleading interpretation of the contents of the Declaration. It is India's view, which has been consistently voiced in all world fora, that global warming is taking place and taking place here now and that its adverse consequences will impact most heavily on developing countries like India. The reference to a two degree centigrade increase as a threshold reflects a prevalent scientific opinion internationally and only reinforces what India has been saying about the dangers from global warming. True, this is the first time that India has accepted a reference to two degree centigrade in a document as a possible threshold guiding global action, but this is entirely in line with our stated position on global warming. Drawing attention to the seriousness of global warming does not automatically translate into a compulsion on the part of India or other developing countries, represented in the Major Economic Forum, to accept emission reduction obligations. I should like to mention in this matter that our position and the Chinese position are nearly identical, and we have been coordinating our position with that country on this important issue. Quite to the contrary, the greater the threat from global warming, the greater the responsibility of developed countries to take on ambitious emission reduction targets. That is why, 37 developing countries, including India, China, Brazil, South Africa, and Indonesia have tabled a submission at the multilateral negotiations asking the developed countries to accept reduction targets of at least 40 per cent by 2020 with 1990 as the baseline.

Madam, the Major Economic Forum Declaration reaffirms the principles and provisions of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, in particular, the principle of equity and of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

As is well-known, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change imposes emission reduction targets only on developed countries. Developing countries are committed to sustainable development. The full incremental cost of any mitigation by them must be fully compensated by transfers of financial and technological resources from developed countries. This is fully reflected in the Major Economic Forum Declaration. Furthermore, at the insistence of India, supported by other developing countries, the Declaration includes an explicit acknowledgement that in undertaking climate change action, the "first and overriding priority" of developing countries will be their pursuit of the goals of economic and social development and poverty eradication. This should allay any apprehension that India will be under pressure to undertake commitments that may undermine her economic growth prospects.

Madam, with regard to the G-8 decision on the enrichment and re-processing technologies, some Members have raised the issue of the Statement issued by G-8 countries on Non-Proliferation at the L'Aquila Summit in Italy earlier in July, and the reference made to the transfer of enrichment and re-processing items and technology. The concern appears to be as to whether an effort is being made by certain countries to prevent the transfer of enrichment and re-processing items and technology to non-NPT countries, that is, countries like India who have not signed the Non Proliferation Treaty.

Madam Speaker, our Government is fully committed to the achievement of full international civil nuclear cooperation. Consistent with this objective in September last year, India secured a clean, and I repeat we secured a clean exemption from the Nuclear Suppliers Group, one that was India specific. At that time also, there were attempts to make a distinction but we got a clean exemption which means that the Nuclear Suppliers Group consisting of 45 countries has agreed to transfer all technologies which are consistent with their national law. The Statement on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with India approved by the Nuclear Suppliers Group on September 6, 2008 contains India's reciprocal commitments and actions in exchange for access to international civil nuclear cooperation. It is our expectation that any future decisions of the Nuclear Suppliers Group relating to the transfer of enrichment and re-processing item and technology would take into account the special status accorded to India by the NSG. The NSG has given us this clean exemption knowing full well that India is not a signatory to the NPT. Prohibition by the NSG of such transfers would require a consensus among all the 46 countries. That does not exist at present. The exemption given to India by the NSG provides for consultations and we will hence remain engaged with that body so that any decisions take into account the special status accorded to India by the global nuclear community.

As far as G-8 is concerned, the fact is that we have no civil nuclear cooperation agreement with the G-8 Bloc per se. We have, however, signed bilateral agreements with France, Russia and the United States.

I said this before and I repeat it. When I read about this G-8 Statement, I raised this matter with the French President. He was gracious enough to tell me that as far as France is concerned, there would be no restriction on the transfer of these technologies. In fact, he volunteered. He said: "If you want me to go public, even I am willing to do that." So, my understanding of this area is that there is no consensus in the Nuclear Suppliers Group to debar India from access to the reprocessing and enrichment technology.

Madam, in the course of discussion, some hon. Members have raised the issue of our accepting pre-conditions for transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology. I wish to, once again, assure Shri Yashwant Sinha that pending global nuclear disarmament, there is no question of India joining the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty as a non-nuclear weapon State. I would also like to clarify that the transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology has no bearing whatsoever on India's upfront entitlement to reprocess foreign origin spent fuel and the use of such fuel in our own safeguarded facilities. Finally, Madam, I would like to bring to the attention of this august House that India has full mastery of the entire nuclear fuel cycle, and this includes enrichment and reprocessing technology. We have a well-entrenched ENR infrastructure of our own. Our domestic three-stage nuclear power programme is entirely indigenous and self-sustaining. Our indigenous Fast Breeder Reactor Programme and linked technology put us in the league of those very few nations, which today possess cutting-edge technologies. The transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology to India as part of full international civil nuclear cooperation, would be an additionality to accelerate our three-stage programme. Madam, I believe, I have rightly answered all the major points. The hon. External Affairs Minister would sum up the debate. He would deal with other aspects. Thank you.

Smt Sushma Swaraj (Bharatiya Janata Party): Honourable prime Minister, you have given an elaborate reply but there are two questions on climate change and on ENR which arise. You said and hence I repeat that you will reply and go, I will finish what I have to say in five minutes. You have talked about Common but differentiated responsibility in climate change. The principle is the person who spoils the most repairs the most. They should not put their responsibility on other countries. The principle of common but differentiated responsibility came up in Rio-de-Janeiro as well when the UN Framework convention came and after that it came up in the Kyoto Protocol as well. American has not ratified till now the Kyoto Protocol. You said just now that over there in multilateral negotiations Brazil, South Africa-Mexico, they were all with you. My question is that when in multilateral negotiations we were getting the support of so many nations, why did we engage in bilateral negotiations during the visit of Hillary Clinton. In the bilateral negotiations, when the chief negotiator Todd Stern came here, then India's environment minister of state said that we refuse to accept these conditions and he said that he refused to accept as India has already accepted over there. India has agreed in the G-17 states and so I refuse to accept your word here. I would like to ask that the multilateral negotiations that were conducted under common but differentiated responsibility, how did a developing country like India think of engaging in bilateral negotiations with such a developed country as them?

Madam, I said I had two questions. One – on climate change and the second – on ENR. I have already spoken on climate change. The second question on ENR on which Mr. Yashwant Sinha mentioned a little bit that under the India-America Nuclear treaty there is a talk of establishment of a state of the art reprocessing facility. When the G-8 has put a ban on you, you are not going to get even one part from here. It is not a question of fuel, it is a question of technology transfer. When you are not going to get even one part for establishing this facility, then hasn't India taken on a huge burden on itself. I wanted to ask these two questions.

The Prime Minister (Dr. Manmohan Singh): Madam, I would like to say that there are no bilateral negotiations taking place outside the framework of the United Nations Framework Convention. There are discussions. When we have bilateral meetings, there are discussions on many subjects. But these are not negotiations. Negotiating forum is and will be the Framework Convention, the Copenhagen process. That is the correct way of looking at it. Whatever we discuss in the G-8, it is all designed to explore various options to build the consensus. These are not negotiating forums at all. Now, with regard to the ENR facilities, the 123 Agreement provides for a dedicated re-processing facility. For that, negotiations have already started. There was a time limit by which those negotiations had been completed. They are moving in the right direction. So, it is not at all, I think, true to say that this re-processing facility will face any difficulty. First of all, I am not sure that the 45-Member Nuclear Suppliers Group will endorse what the G-8 people decide. Attempts were made in the past also. But I think there are many people who believe that the country like India has to be treated differently and it is the source of strength that this recognition prevented a consensus which would have been injurious to us.

Shri Basu Deb Acharia (CPI-M): Madam Speaker, the pillar of our foreign policy, which was referred to by Shri Yashwant Sinha, started cracking when BJP was in power. ... (Interruptions)

Madam, we have seen how a Cabinet Minister was secretly meeting with a junior Minister of United States of America, Mr. Strobe Talbot one day in London, other day in Washington, in New York and then in other places. We have seen also the consensus which we have in regard to our foreign policy, in regard to our signing of CTBT and NPT. There is an attempt to change our foreign policy. We have seen when Iraq was attacked by America, the Government of the day was reluctant to condemn the brutal attack on Iraq.

We had to stall the proceedings of both the Houses for three days. You were in the Rajya Sabha at that point of time. We had to stop the House, disrupt the proceedings of the House for three days, stall the House rather for three or four days and then the Government agreed to bring a soft resolution not "condemn" but "deplore". We had the apprehension. That was why in the Common Minimum Programme of UPA-I, in the paragraph on foreign policy, it was categorically mentioned that our foreign policy would be an independent foreign policy and our relations with the United States of America will be a friendly relation, but it will not be a strategic relation. The hon. Prime Minister, after returning from Italy and Egypt, made a statement in this House, the very day he returned from Italy and Egypt, where he said in the last but one paragraph and I quote : "India seeks cooperative relation with Pakistan and engagement is the only way forward to realize the vision of a stable and prosperous South Asia living in peace and amity.

"I agree with this contention. But, in the preceding paragraph the hon. Prime Minister said : "The starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is a fulfilment of their commitment in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India." Then he said : "The action on terrorism should not be linked to composite dialogue and, therefore, cannot wait other developments. It was agreed that the two countries will share real-time, credible and actionable information on any future terrorist threats." There is a contradiction in the statement itself. We also agree that there is a need for dialogue because there are outstanding issues which are to be resolved. But the action against the terrorists should also be taken and pressure should be put on Pakistan to take action against the terrorists. The perpetrators of crime that was committed on 26th November last year should be brought to justice. But how?

When the hon. Prime Minister said that "the starting point of any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan is a fulfilment of their commitment in letter and spirit, not to allow their territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activity", and then delinking of action against the terrorists, the action on terrorism not to be linked with composite dialogue, these are contradictory.

This has been done under pressure of the United States of America. Then, Balochistan has also been brought in the agreement, in the Joint Statement. It has also been done under pressure of the USA.

Madam, the Prime Minister, while intervening, has stated that this issue was raised on the floor of this House. When in our House and the other House, we discussed the Indo-US Nuclear Deal, a number of times, we had expressed our apprehension. The Prime Minister a number of times stated, and today also he said, that it marks the end of India's decades of isolation from nuclear mainstream and technical denial regime. He has said that in this House also, but we have also pointed out a number of times that the waiver is not a clean waiver. It is stated not only in the G-8 meeting now, but earlier also, that the waiver that our Government claims, is not a clean waiver because we cannot separate Hyde Act and 123 Agreement. When the Prime Minister was speaking today, he has expressed his doubt whether all the 45 NSG countries will agree to that proposal or not. If the position was what the Prime Minister has said today that there is on condition in regard to import of ENR technology, how was this issue raised in the G-8 meeting? If no such condition has been imposed by USA that enrichment technology will not be available to our country even after we sign nuclear agreement, how was this issue raised in G-8 meeting? Not only the USA has categorically stated that although the agreement has been signed, it will be confined only to reactor and nuclear fuel, but the USA will also ask all other NSG countries not to supply this technology to our country. So, there will not be available any enrichment technology to our country. What will happen to our research and development in the field of nuclear technology? We want to reach to the third phase – from uranium to plutonium to thorium. What is the intention of the USA behind keeping our country dependent for supply of nuclear fuel on other countries?

Shri Basu Deb Acharia: Madam, yesterday while intervening in the debate the Prime Minister said with regard to availability of ENR technology, "As far as the G8 is concerned, the fact is that we have no civil nuclear cooperation agreement with G8 bloc per se. We have, however, signed bilateral agreements with France, Russia and the United States." We know that India first signed a bilateral agreement with the United States of America and subsequently signed bilateral agreements with France and Russia. But these are member countries of the G8 grouping. All the representatives in the meeting of G8 countries decided that they would not allow ENR technology to a country which has not signed the Non-Proliferation Treaty. When they have decided so jointly and collectively, how can one of those countries separately decide to supply this technology to our country? There are three countries with nuclear weapons - India, Pakistan and North Korea – which have not signed the NPT and India is being isolated in the case of availability of enrichment and reprocessing technology.

Sir, you know that there is a consensus in our country that we will not be party to an agreement that is discriminatory. Non-Proliferation Treaty is a discriminatory agreement. We did not agree to sign the FMCT and CTBT because those are discriminatory agreements. We will not be party to such discriminatory agreements. From the very beginning the Government of India knew that the United States of America, even after signing the agreement, made it clear that they would not supply reprocessing technology to our country. We are proud of our indigenous technology. We have our technology but this has to be updated. The main interest of the United States of America is to supply reactor and nuclear fuel. Other than reactor and nuclear fuel, they agreed to supply no item to our country. Then, how can the Prime Minister say that the exemption is unconditional and the exemption is clear? Exemption that has been given in regard to nuclear fuel is unconditional, and no conditions have been imposed.

How has he said this : The USA has proposed or rather the G-8 countries have decided collectively that they would not supply the reprocessing technology to a country which has not adhered to the non-proliferation architecture? How would the other country disobey if it has been decided like that in the G-8 countries? What will happen to our R&D in regard to nuclear technology? We will be deprived of that and we will not be able to reach the third phase, that is the thorium-phase in nuclear technology. The Prime Minister stated in his intervention that we have developed our indigenous technology, why did we agree to sign the nuclear cooperation agreement? What was the need and necessity if we will not get ENR technology? Why should our country be deprived even after our Prime Minister said that we have got clean waiver? The second question is on end use monitoring agreement.

The Prime Minister said that this end use monitoring was in existence since 1990. Whatever equipment we have purchased from the USA, all of them are subject to end use monitoring by the USA. But it was on an ad hoc basis.

There was no agreement with the USA; that has been stated by the Prime Minister, while intervening yesterday. When the agreement has been signed by India and the USA, what will happen? This is very important, but that question has not been addressed by the Prime Minister yesterday. The US will have the right to check whether India is using any purchased weapon for the purpose for which it was intended. This could mean a weapon system bought by India to bolster defence; say, for instance, against China or if India wants to use it against Pakistan, they will not be able to use it against Pakistan. EUMA restricts what purchasing country like India can do with US-origin defence equipment, even within its own border; you will not be able to do anything with the equipment which we purchase from the USA.

Mr. Chairman: Okay, please conclude. There are 13 more hon. Members waiting to speak; please allow others to make their speeches. The hon. Minister may reply at 3 o'clock. SHRI

Shri Basu Deb Acharia (CPI-M): Under the terms of EUMA, India cannot modify the purchased defence article or system in any form. And, it also cannot prevent the buyer country from freeing itself from dependency on United States for maintenance. India would not be able to undertake maintenance of any of the equipment purchased from America. This is not so with the other countries. We have purchased a number of Defence equipment from Russia, erstwhile USSR but this end-use monitoring system was not there for the equipment purchased from other countries. This restricts India from getting ordinary US Defence equipment serviced by any other country without prior American permission. The Prime Minister has stated that the inspection will be fixed on mutually agreed date and the inspector from America will inspect the equipment supplied by America. Those inspectors will not be allowed to visit any sensitive establishment in our country. If any equipment is installed in a sensitive establishment in our country, then that equipment has to be brought to other place for inspection. This is nothing but infringement on our sovereignty, our independence. So, by signing the End-Use Monitoring Agreement with the United States of America, we have become different as with no other country this system is there. When there was an ad hoc arrangement, why did India sign the Agreement? Our C&AG and Air Chief has also criticised signing the Agreement with the United States of America in regard to the End-Use Monitoring. We think this is an infringement on our sovereignty. Our independence has been surrendered to the United States of America and we opposed this End-Use Monitoring Agreement which has been signed between the Government of India and the United States of America. Thank you, Sir.

Shri B. Mahtab: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I stand here to participate in the discussion, the second day, relating to the issues arising out of the Prime Minister's recent visit to foreign countries. The issues before us are manifold, no doubt, but I will confine myself to four issues;

- India Pakistan Joint Statement
- The End-Use Monitoring Agreement with the United States
- The G8 Resolution on Enrichment Technology
- The Agreement on Climate Change.

I would deduce the discussion today on two counts. One is the delinking of terrorism from composite dialogue process and the inclusion of a reference relating to Balochistan in the joint statement. Second is, End-Use Monitoring Agreement about which the Government has fought shy of taking this House into confidence. On July 9th the Foreign Affairs Minister Shri Krishna made a suo motu statement in this House on significant developments in our neighbourhood. In Para 4 of that statement the first indication of softening towards Pakistan was indicated and I would quote: "When the Prime Minister met President Asif Ali Zardari, it was agreed that the Foreign Secretaries of India and Pakistan will discuss what Pakistan is doing and do to prevent terrorism from Pakistan against India and to bring to justice those responsible for those attacks including the horrendous crime of the attacks in Mumbai."

So, the decision to discuss was not a sudden one. After the Pakistan directed massive explosion in the Indian Embassy in Kabul last July, already a year has passed, which was followed not long after by the outrage in Mumbai, this country had suspended the composite bilateral dialogue process with Pakistan.

A condition was officially stipulated and reiterated at every opportunity that the composite dialogue could be resumed only if Pakistan gave concrete proof of moving against its nationals who attacked Mumbai and dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism on Pakistani soil. None of this thing has come to pass. We have received a dossier and the end result is only five persons. A month ago when hon. Prime Minister, Dr. Singh met President Zardari in Yekaterinburg, he had bluntly told President Zardari that "My mandate is limited to telling you that the territory of Pakistan must not be allowed to be used for terrorism against India. But the developments show that the Prime Minister's warning went unheeded. On 19th July this month, Indian security forces have captured two well armed Pakistani terrorists of Lashkar-e-Toiba, Mohammad Adnan and Mohammad Shafkat, who hail from Sahiwal district of Pakistani Punjab, and who infiltrated across the line of control. They have revealed that they belonged to a group of 15 militants who had been trained in Pak-occupied Kashmir to attack the Baglihar Dam in Jammu and Kashmir. They also revealed that a secret tunnel was being built near the border town of Sialkot for infiltration into India across the international border. Three days later, Mr. Richard Barrett, Coordinator of the United Nations Security Council's Al-Qaeda and Taliban Sanctions Committee, has warned that there was a "real risk" that the Lashkar-e-Toiba would target India again. These are two instances which demonstrate that infrastructure of terrorism in Pakistan remains alive and kicking.

Let us not forget that on January 6, 2004, the Prime Minister Vajpayee and President Musharaf had jointly declared that India agreed to resume the composite dialogue process with Pakistan only after a categorical assurance from General Musharaf that the territory under Pakistan's control would not be used for terrorism against India.

There has thus been a clear link between Pakistan dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism on the one hand and India agreeing to continue the composite dialogue on the other. Despite this, the Joint Declaration after Prime Minister, Dr. Singh and the Prime Minister, Mr. Gilani astonishingly notes – "Both Prime Ministers recognised that dialogue is the only way forward. Action on terrorism should not be linked to a composite dialogue process and these should not be bracketed. Is this not an assurance that we will continue dialogue irrespective of whether or not the infrastructure of terrorism is dismantled? I raised this last week also when this was being discussed in this House and I reiterate it again. Who is fooling whom? Is this not a dramatic reversal of the Indian position obtaining till now? I am of the opinion that there is nothing static in the world. I am not a status quoist nor our country should be. We should strive for change and change in foreign policy is required keeping in mind the change that the world is undergoing today. Once we accept this, as a policy, say it. Also say that the discontinuance of composite dialogue paid us no result. Scant attention was given by the powers that be, to pressurize Pakistan to apprehend the culprits of Pakistani nationals who were behind the Mumbai attack. Say it that Jamaat-ud-Dawa Chief Hafiz Saeed is walking free in Pakistan because you were unable to provide evidence and that is why you had to make a course correction and started the dialogue, at least, at the Secretary level. Say it that Islamabad has withstood Washington's pressure because both are fighting a different war together on a different front, so India's case can be ignored.

We are asked to believe on the trial process of Pakistan to convict the perpetrators of terrorist activities in India.

But are we not aware that Pakistan is yet to complete the trial process of Omar Syed Sheikh who was involved in brutally murdering American Journalist Daniel Pearl in 2001? It is an open secret that people like Omar Sheikh, A Q Khan, Hafiz Mohammed Saeed or Zakia Rahman Lakhir cannot be punished because they will spill the beans. We should understand the attitude of Pakistan. Sentimentalism has no place in international relations. We are neither equal victims of terrorism, nor we share a common destiny. A democratic, secular India cannot share a "Common Destiny" with a theocratic, feudal and military dominated Pakistan. Why should we be forced to believe that a rising India cannot assert its rightful place in the comity of nations without good neighbourly relations with Pakistan? This attitude undermines our diplomacy. Pakistan for the last three decades had created, harboured and trained terrorists backed by ISI to make India bleed and seek strategic depth in Afghanistan. India has been a victim of terrorism sponsored by Pakistan for the past three decades. Now what do we have? The Government has equated the two countries in Sharm-el-Sheikh. Sir, now I would talk about the reference to Balochistan in the India Pakistan Joint Statement. That is worrisome. If Prime Minister Gilani mentioned that Pakistan has some information on threats in Balochistan and other areas, why does it have to be mentioned in the Joint Statement? What is the relevance of such a formulation? It is a Pakistani perspective. It is for the first time that an India-Pakistan Joint Statement hints at Indian involvement in Balochistan and other areas.

Sir, I need not delve into other matters as the time is very short. But till now there has been no credible report of any Indian sponsored activity in that province of Pakistan. But I would also like to take the opportunity of speaking in this House that with over one lakh Americans and NATO forces in Afghanistan, any action by India that complicates the NATO mission would have invited America's attention. I have a direct question. Have Americans, by implication, rejected Pakistan's baseless claims of Indian interference? I would like to know this from the hon. Minister. All those who care for this nation, all those who have lost their near and dear ones in the serial terrorist strikes across India till November 26 in Mumbai treats this as a betrayal. I believe in the words of the hon. Prime Minister of India for the interpretation he has given. Many people do in this country. The reference to Balochistan and other areas in the Joint Statement has to be excluded from any bilateral discussion in future as it is totally inapplicable and unacceptable to India. Sir, let me conclude. I am not dealing with end-use. But I would like to make a short point on climate change. There is pressure from the rich nations on the developing nations and it is going in WTO way. When we are meeting in Copenhagen, I have information in my command that we are taking a different stand which is a consistent one, but my question here is, what is the quantity of Greenhouse emission that our country does? Are we conscious of that? We may have a point of view in different forums but what is the Greenhouse emission that our country does and what steps is the Government taking to minimise it?

Sir, yes, the hon. Prime Minister has struck the right note in this House by clarifying what India expects of Pakistan and has relied heavily on France and wants itself to be engaged with United States. We could not agree with him more and expect him to hold firm on the course he has worked out for the country. Thank you .

Shri Anant Gangaram Geete (Shiv Sena): Respected Deputy Speaker, there has been a lot of debate in the country in respect of the Prime Minister's recent foreign visits, his contrasting statements, his joint statement with Pakistan which he has signed, the end use monitoring agreement. There have been discussions in the electronic media, in the print media and several doubts have been raised because of these statements. This was kept before the house yesterday by Shri Yashwant Sinha under Rule 193. He has already elaborated it in detail.

The Prime Minister also participated in the discussion and kept forth in the house his own views. When he stood before the house, he stressed on the fact which he wanted all of us not to forget that Pakistan is a neighbour and we have to keep friendly relations with neighbours. I am in agreement with the Prime Minister in this respect that Pakistan is a neighbour and we should have good relations with Pakistan but the question is whether Pakistan considers us our neighbour. Does Pakistan accept that India is its neighbour and it should have good relations with India?

The behaviour of Pakistan towards India in the last 20 years, their attitude towards us forces me to say that Pakistan does not consider us our neighbour, they consider us their enemy. They look at us like enemies and not that of neighbours. The Prime Minister has given a statement that Pakistan is our neighbour but Pakistan does not agree with this. Pakistan looks at us like enemies and their behaviour towards us is the same as it would be towards enemies and that it has been doing for the last 20 years. All the terrorist attacks in India whether it is the attack on Red Fort, , attack on Parliament, attack on Mumbai railway station, Bomb blast at Gateway of India or the ghastly most recent Mumbai attacks on 26th November, all the governments of the time whether it is the UPA government or the NDA government, whether it was Deve Gowda's government or I.K.Gujral's government, the home minister of each of the government's have all stated to the House that Pakistan has been responsible for those attacks. Each Home Minister has said the same thing for the last 20 years and Pakistan has continued to attack us in this manner, they have been running a proxy war for the last 20 years. Pakistan has realized that they cannot fight with India in a straight one to one war and hence this proxy war for the last 20 years.

Respected Deputy Speaker, the four wars that we have fought and the last one being the Kargil war, in all these five wars, the number of soldiers that we have lost during the war, we have lost more than that in these terrorist attacks. And over and above the common man, the common citizen, the civilian whose numbers are more than 70 thousand. ....(Interruption) Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav is giving me the information that this count has increased to one lakh. I had mentioned 70 thousand but he has corrected the figure and made it reach one lakh. This one lakh which consists of children, old people, women, students etc. have been killed in these terrorist attacks much more than the soldiers we lost in the five wars that we have fought.

Mr. Deputy speaker, Pakistan does not consider us our neighbour. Pakistan considers us their enemy. Their politics runs only on this track. The person who talks against the most, who considers India as the biggest enemy, he will only rule the longest. And this is true whether it is President Musharraf or President Zardari or Nawaz Sharif who was the ex-prime Minister or the present Prime Minister Gilani, whoever is in the government or whosoever is the president, they will cause maximum harm to India. They consider us their enemies and their behaviour towards us is the same. Accepting the Prime Minister's statement, I request on behalf of the House and on behalf of my party that till the terrorist activities supported by Pakistan are not totally finished, there should not be any dialogue with Pakistan, our government should not have any dialogue with Pakistan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, everybody know what the country went through when Mumbai was attacked on 26/11? The whole country was unified in its thinking after the 26/11 Mumbai attacks. The country had unified irrespective of caste, religion, language, region, it brought together the entire country. Several Muslim organizations had taken out rallies in Mumbai against Pakistan. Muslim organizations had blamed Pakistan and had warned Pakistan to discontinue this. At that time the whole world was unified in its opinion against Pakistan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the time of the attacks, a lot of letters had been discussed in parliament and I had mentioned some letters written by women. Today I am again going to mention such a letter which shows the state of our country and their mental frame of mind. Women had sent lakhs of letters to members of parliament and I am going to mention one of hem today. It is not there in my hand but I will definitely present it in the House. It is there at my residence but I have not got it here. That letter was in Hindi and showcases the woman's sentiments. She had written, 'A person makes a mistake once, he is human; he makes the mistake a second time, he is ignorant; he makes the mistake again and again, that is Pakistan; and the person who forgives everybody's mistake everytime, that is Hindustan.' In that latter the lady has vented her anger and the last sentence was 'Attack Pakistan'. A woman of our country, a mother had written that letter. We had received lakhs of letters of this kind at that time. The whole country was angry. Pakistan has been mounting terror attacks for the last so many years. Till the time that Pakistan does not stop supporting terrorist organisations, does not remove all the terror training camps on its soil, we should not have any dialogue with Pakistan.

.....(Interruption)

I am just going to conclude. I will finish the other points in one sentence each.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, the concerns expressed here today regarding global warming, the statement given by the Prime Minister in that regard, I will give my comments in one sentence.....(Interruption)

Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav has reminded me that we wasted two instances; one when the parliament was attacked. At that time our government should have attacked Pakistan. The second was when the Mumbai attack took place, at that time the government had given the statement that this attack was not just on Mumbai but on the whole country. Despite that we did not attack Pakistan. I am not a supporter of war but Pakistan seems to understand only this language, it doesn't seem to understand any other language. Whether we wage war or not is a different issue but we can definitely take a decision that till the time Pakistan does not give proof of improvement in this situation, till that time we will not have any dialogue with Pakistan. In 1993 there were bomb blasts in Mumbai. That matter went upto the supreme Court and it was finally decided that the offenders were Dawood Ibrahim and some others who were declared absconding. They are all in Pakistan but till date Pakistan has not handed them over to us.....(Interruption)

.....(Interruption)

The government is repeatedly asking. That is why we should not have any dialogue with Pakistan.

On the issue of global warming, I will only say one thing of which I am scared. Today our country is a developing country. There are a lot of countries who are even more backward than us which are undeveloped. Talking about global warming, Shri Yashwant Sinha has given some statistics for which the developed countries are responsible. You will be surprised that in the CBSE syllabus today, children are being taught about global warming. ....(Interruption)

I am keeping this in front of the house because we have to think about this seriously. The countries which are responsible for global warming, in those countries the children are not taught lessons on global warming but they are being taught in India wherein we are not responsible at all for the situation. It is not our fault. If we accept their views, we will have to accept that our dream of being in the line of developed countries by 2020 will remain a dream and it will not get fulfilled. If we accept what they say, we will not be in the line of developed countries by 2020.

The topic of Agreement and Enduse monitoring has also come up. Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav said correctly yesterday that if you have done such an agreement, please throw it in the garbage bin. I repeat the sentiment because it is an attack on our independence by America. If the government accepts such an intrusion or attack, then its results will have to be borne by the entire country. Thank you.

Dr. M. Thambidurai (AIADMK): Respected Deputy-Speaker, Sir, I rise to participate in the discussion on the Statement made by the Prime Minister in this House on 17th July after his visit to Italy, France and Egypt. Sir, I have carefully gone through that Statement and also his intervention in the House yesterday.

I would like to very briefly remind the House of the contrary positions that the Prime Minister took. To begin with, before leaving for the three-country-visits, the stated position of the Government of India was that Pakistan must act on terror before any meaningful discussion could be started.

India also refused to hold any talks with Pakistan until the perpetrators of 26/11 attacks were brought to book. India had been consistently saying that there has to be transparent action against the culprits, the masterminds of the Mumbai terrorist attacks. Secondly, after making the Joint Statement, he dropped our demand of action against the attackers and said that dialogue is the only way forward. It is apparent.

Thirdly, while intervening in the debate yesterday, he tried to only justify his action. He mentioned that we should trust and verify Pakistan's actions.

He stated that the former Prime Minister Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee also followed the same path of dialogue despite several setbacks. He further mentioned that a peaceful and a friendly neighbour is in India's interest. But where has this wisdom gone so far? Since the 26/11 Mumbai attacks and till he signed the Joint Statement, India was all along saying that Pakistan must bring the culprits to book before we start the process of dialogue. Why should he take a contrary stand without taking Parliament into confidence and why should he unilaterally change the position? Of course, we are for friendly relations with all neighbouring countries, but that should not be taken for a ride by any neighbour.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that we should trust Pakistan. I will make only three sentences to show how cannot trust Pakistan. On July 8th, the Intelligence Bureau made an alert that there is going to be another attack on Mumbai. The Home Minister Shri P. Chidambaram warned that Pakistan based terrorists would launch another sea-borne attack on Mumbai at seven places. The second is, Beijing issued a White Paper claiming that a large number of Xingjian terrorists have been getting training in camps in Pakistan. The third is that Ms. Hillary Clinton, on her visit to India, said that Pakistan is the home to syndicate of terror. So, how can we trust Pakistan? Pakistan had not kept up any promise it made on taking action against terrorists. Even the mastermind behind the Mumbai attack is set free in Pakistan. There is also a growing concern since Pakistan is inducting a large amount of sophisticated defence equipment on our Western borders. Will this create mutual trust and confidence? In the Joint Statement, he allowed Pakistan to make a mention of Balochistan. India has nothing to do with what is happening there. But just two days after this Joint Statement, Pakistan started linking India with the troubles in Balochistan. The Pakistani Army Chief also stated that Pakistan would tackle Lashkar-e-Toiba, if India stops messing around in Balochistan. This cannot be tolerated. So I want to say that they were never serious and trusting Pakistan again might end up in further troubles for India.

Yesterday, NDA Members accused the UPA for the steps taken relating to Pakistan. In the same way, the UPA Members also accused NDA for whatever action taken during their tenure. But I want to accuse both sides on this issue. What happened during the Kargil War? When the Kargil War took place, the NDA friends were very much hostile towards Pakistan. After the Kargil War, they got into power and did nothing. In the same way, after the 26/11 attack in Mumbai, the UPA friends said that they are going to be very serious in taking action against Pakistan. They said so many things, but now after the election is over, after assuming power, they also changed their attitude. But the common people of India and Pakistan are suffering due to terrorism. So, this kind of politics must be avoided on this issue. We have to protect the sovereignty of our country and we must not succumb to any pressure from Pakistan.

Secondly, yesterday when the hon. Prime Minister made a statement, he said that he met the President of Sri Lanka. I would like to know what transpired between the President of Sri Lanka and our Prime Minister. We are very much worried about the pathetic conditions of Sri Lankan Tamil people in Sri Lanka. I would like to know whether any discussion took place between the President of Sri Lanka and our hon. Prime Minister. Our hon. Amma, Ms. Jayalalitha has requested that a sum of Rs.10,000 crore must be allotted for the rehabilitation of Sri Lankan Tamils in Sri Lanka. But the Budget provided for only Rs.500 crore for them. I am saying this because when we have set so much commitment for this and when our Prime Minister gave a statement, why he has not mentioned about this meeting between the Sri Lankan President and the Prime Minister of India. I have already stated that we must not succumb to the pressure of America also because we are importing so much technology. When we are having that kind of defence equipment, we must see that they must not come and visit our places wherever we are using the equipment. That is also very important as our hon. Members said that our sovereignty must be protected and we must have every right to protect whatever we want. Therefore, when we are importing technology, we must not allow the foreign countries to visit and supervise these things. Some hon. Members have also touched upon the issue of climatic conditions. Foreign countries must not exploit the Indian condition and we must see that they must not take advantage of that. We must have our own foreign policy. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru made a policy of non-alignment. That kind of policy is suitable for us and that has to be adhered to by our country.

Shri Gurudas Dasgupta (CPI): Sir, I have no hesitation in saying that the statement made by hon. Prime Minister is a matter of welcome to us. I have no hesitation in saying that. There is no reason why I should not feel that I agree with many of his formulations with regard to our policy on Pakistan. There is a change in the situation. We cannot just only remember Kargil, we cannot just only remember attack on Parliament. There is, of course, a grim reality. We have also to feel that there is a change in Pakistan and the change for the better. There has to be a voice of sanity in India and not a voice of serenity. The handing over of a dossier by Government of Pakistan confirming the involvement of Pak nationals in the violent attack on Mumbai is a significant development which need not be ignored by us. The five persons, or maybe more, who have masterminded the attack are on trial and second challan is likely to be submitted by the prosecution. This is the wind of change in Pakistan even in the ruling clique.

We must be aware, Sir, that there is growing awareness among the people of Pakistan. People of India like friendship with Pakistan and people of Pakistan like friendship with India.

We are the two great neighbours in South Asia. Not only we have to live in peace – we cannot indulge in the luxury of fighting each other – but we have to fight against poverty, unemployment, and economic evils. Therefore, the whole intention of Indian political establishment, including India, would be to ensure the consolidation of the forces of peace and friendship in Pakistan. Our voice must reach to the people of Pakistan. Our warning should reach to the terrorist group. There has to be a voice of sanity; there has to be a voice of perseverance. There should not be a voice of senility.

I feel that a fractured Pakistan is more dangerous to India than the terrorist groups that seek to work on the soil of that country to mount attack. I am in agreement with the Prime Minister while he is saying that we want a peaceful, a prosperous, a democratic Pakistan and also growing friendship between us. Our own intention is to strengthen not the forces of militancy but the forces of democracy, the forces of peace, the forces of friendship in Pakistan. They are equally poor like India. They are equally unemployed. There has been lack of development. Therefore, there is a common ground to fight against the common enemies, that is poverty and unemployment I have a word of caution to my friends in the Opposition also, we should not overplay suspicion to build up Parliamentary offensive in the House. We cannot be led by suspicion. But I must say that Prime Minister's foreign visit was not all in glory. His observation on G-8 countries' Resolution is absolutely ambiguous and it raises suspicion about the success of India's diplomacy.

The comment of the Prime Minister on the end-use of military hardware is unacceptable. The inspection of India's defence establishment by foreign personnel is definitely an infringement of the sovereignty of this nation. This is unfortunate. But I must say that the hon. Prime Minister has forgotten something to tell us. How has he forgotten his participation in the Non-Aligned Conference? India is one of the architects of the Non-Alignment Movement. There has been a Conference; there has been a declaration; and there has been a call for united action on vital, fundamental, global issues. There has been a call for a war-free world; there has been a call for the establishment of an independent State of Palestine. There has been a protest vigorously against the attack of Israel. How has he forgotten it? Does it mean to say that the Non-Alignment Movement is a low priority of the foreign policy of the Government of India? It is for him to clarify. But again I say, we would like to live in peace with Pakistan not of course giving up our fight against terrorism. Terrorism we must fight but friendship we must also have.

We want peace in the sub-continent. We do not want war. I am surprised the way in which one of my previous speakers had even quoted a letter by a person - maybe that person is a lunatic - that why India did not attack Pakistan. This is not the voice of India. The voice of India is the voice of peace and friendship in the sub-continent. Thank you, Sir.

The Minister of Finance (Shri Pranab Mukherjee): Mr. Deputy-Speaker, Sir, since yesterday the hon. Members are participating in the discussion arising out of the Statement issued by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has already clarified in detail the three major issues which were raised in the course of the discussion – firstly, whether we have diluted our position in respect of our resolve to fight against terrorism and our concept of zero tolerance for terrorism; secondly, whether in any way by using a particular phrase we have indirectly or implicitly involved ourselves in a matter which was not earlier the part of the bilateral discussions; and thirdly, certain other issues raised in connection with the visit which have been amply clarified by the Prime Minister in his observations while responding to the debate yesterday. My observation is limited to certain basic fundamental issues in respect of our foreign policy. Mr. Deputy-Speaker, Sir, I do not mind at all whether I encourage more and more discussions on foreign policy because that is an arena where the Members of Parliament should have interests. It is exclusively within the domain of the Union Government but I am little pained when a visit is being used by the principal Opposition Party even to march to the Rashtrapathi Bhavan and submit a Memorandum where they say: "The Government has altered the fundamental foundations of India's foreign policy and strategic interest. That is the Memorandum which they submitted; it is a part of the concluding paragraph. At the beginning of the Memorandum they suggested that within weeks of returning to power, the UPA Government headed by Dr. Manmohan Singh will completely reverse India's strategic and foreign policy positions much to the detriment of the nation. I have serious objections to these formulations and postulations.

India's foreign policy is not the whims and caprices of individuals or that of even a single Party. India's foreign policy is embedded in the basic fundamentals of our 5,000 years old civilization where we have stated Vasudeva Kutumbakam – whole universe is my friend' long before Independence; the actual formulation of the foreign policy by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru through the principles of Panchsheel; and the principles of non-violence and truth enunciated by the Father of the nation.

That is the very basic fundamental of India's Foreign Policy and that basic fundamental has been endorsed by the people of this great country. That can never be altered. That is as simple as that. Now, what has happened with the visit of the Prime Minister? Serious allegations have been raised that we have altered our position in respect of terrorism. Where? How? I have the list; I would not like to reel out the list because many Members have spoken. From 1999 onwards, how many times we have started talks? Talks were disrupted. Dialogue process was disrupted because of events, because of terrorist attacks from 1999 onwards. It has been going on for more than last quarter a century. Who does not know? Surely, the initiator of the discussion, the former Foreign Minister and the former Finance Minister, Yashwant Sinha was well aware of that. It was a part of the Pakistan Policy, after getting successive defeats to inflict 1000 scars so that India dies bleeding. That was propagated by one of the Military Rulers of Pakistan. It is well-known. It has been practised through the cross-border terrorism. But neither we have succumbed to that terrorism, neither we have succumbed to that policy nor did we stop talking. This is the bare fact.

You did it; India did it; UPA did it; and this is the process through which the world diplomacy moves. Everybody knew that — before the Second World War when Chamberlain entered into the Munich Pact — it is not going to succeed, it is not going to keep Adolph Hitler happy, but at the same time, it was considered necessary to have that, because they thought that the last effort should be made to save the world from the impending Second World War. As a humble student of history, this is the lesson of diplomacy, which we should not forget.

We cannot erase Pakistan. Pakistan is going to exist; and it is not new that our relationship with Pakistan has not been cordial from the very beginning.

Many of you may remember that after signing the Nehru-Liyaqat Pact in 1950, in 1951 while participating in a debate on the floor of this very House, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru reminded through a story that sometimes the condition of Pakistan is like this, that it is like an errand boy, who killed both his parents – father and mother – and thereafter, when he was prosecuted, he was pleading mercy saying: “Me Lord, pardon me because I am an orphan. He himself killed his father and he himself killed his mother, but he pleaded that he was an orphan.

Therefore, that has happened. But that is a reality. That does not mean that we should stop talking. Nowhere. Talking does not mean a full-fledged meaningful dialogue.

Keeping the communication channel open does not mean it is conceding or surrendering on any particular point. Therefore, this aspect is to be kept in view. We shall have to keep that in view. What is foreign policy? Foreign policy is the extension of the national interest in the context of the external situation and atmosphere. Therefore, I shall have to enhance my national interest. I shall have to advance my national interest in the context of the external atmosphere. The world is changing, and simply we cannot keep our positions straitjacketed, a perception which refuses to acknowledge or admit the elements of change. War-mongering is no way. Even when I was making the statement as the then Minister of External Affairs, I had expressed my strong resentment. Somebody suggested from the other side, why do you not attack Pakistan? My instant response, standing from here itself, was that that is not the solution to the problem. War is no solution.

Therefore, we shall have to pursue our policies of zero tolerance. I would not like to repeat. Events have clearly established that we are not succumbing to the pressure of anybody. Madam Speaker, more often than not, myself and Advaniji are two old Members of that House and this House. Of course, he has spent more time in this House compared to me but I have spent more time in that House. Umpteen number of times, I have heard that our sovereignty is compromised. While entering into a broadcasting agreement in the early 60s, known as VoAA, Voice of America Agreement, I heard them saying that our sovereignty had been compromised. While borrowing some money from International Monetary Fund, it was said that our economic sovereignty had been mortgaged. While signing the WTO Agreement in the early mid 90s, they said, “Oh, our sovereignty has collapsed. While entering into Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement, they have said we have compromised our national sovereignty. Questions have been raised. G-8 countries are saying that they are not in favour of supplying ENR technology to those countries which are not signatories to the NPT. Is it for the first time G-8 countries are saying so? Is it not a fact that since the days of formulation of NPT in the 70s, G-8 countries continued to pressurise the entire world? They have their own logic. We have our own logic. We have made it quite clear that we consider that it is a discriminatory treaty. We consider that it creates nuclear haves and have-nots. That is why, we did not sign and we have no intention of signing it.

Yashwant Sinhaji reflected on my observations. What did I say? In the other House, I said, yes, I have noted the observations of the G-8. But G-8 is not the appropriate forum to decide about the Civil Nuclear Technology Agreement. The two appropriate fora are IAEA and NSG. In NSG, we got clean waiver. As many as eight times, this issue has been debated in this House and in that House. It is not once or twice.

I do not remember any foreign policy issue has been so extensively and so exhaustively debated in this House or in that House. ... (Interruptions) But, despite that ..... (Interruptions) (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: Please, I am not yielding. ... (Interruptions)

Madam Speaker: Please do not interrupt. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: You have your own perceptions. I know your nuclear doctrine which you reflected in the last Elections. ... (Interruptions)

Madam Speaker: Please keep quiet. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee : You only remember what you did say that South Asia should be nuclear weapon-free. What is South Asia? It is India and Pakistan. China will have nuclear weapon; USA will have nuclear weapon; France will have nuclear weapon and England will have nuclear weapon. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Basu Deb Acharia: I did not say. ... (Interruptions)

(Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee : China will have nuclear weapon, but not India. ... (Interruptions) That is your nuclear doctrine and the people of India have rejected your nuclear doctrine. ... (Interruptions) Please remember that.

Shri Basu Deb Acharia: I did not take that stand. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: Please remember that. The people of India have rejected that doctrine. Therefore, most respectfully I would like to submit that do not treat the sovereignty of 112 to 115 crore people as so cheap that it can be mortgaged, that it can be bartered in any way. I would not have minded if some casual remarks would have been made. Where is the fundamental change of the foreign policy? I would like to know. Have we deviated from the principles of building up brotherly relationship, close friendship with our neighbours? Is it not our stated policy that we will come to the aid of each and every neighbour? Is it not our stated policy we do not believe in exporting our ideology, we do not believe in exporting our sphere of influence and we do not believe in the interference of the internal matters of any other country? Therefore, this aspect is to be kept in view. Yes, there will be divergence of opinion. But if we point out that basic fundamentals are changed, I am afraid, the basic fundamentals are not changed in that simple manner. Everybody agrees with me. The hon. Prime Minister has made it quite clear. We have nothing to hide in Baloochistan. Who does not know the problems of Baloochistan? Particularly the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows it very well. It was created from May, 1947 itself when the understanding between Quaid-E-Azam Jinnah and Khan of Kalat of Baloochistan a few days before the creation of Pakistan, perhaps, 11th August, 1947 and subsequently the accession of Baloochistan to Pakistan in 1948.

From 1950s onwards there are problems. Problems are continuing. It is their internal matter. We have nothing to hide. We have not done anything there. We have no intention of doing anything there. We are the victims of the terrorism.

We have no intention of exporting terrorism to any country. It is against our principles.

I am grateful to the NDA Government which has established four Consulates there. It is because we want to help our friends in Afghanistan. They are good people. We have historic and traditional relations. Because of certain developments since the late 1940s, our traditional and historic ties have been snapped. Land route is not available. But that does not mean the centuries old cultural and historical relationship with that country can be snapped. Therefore, we wanted to help them. In order to help them, these Consulates were established there. It was a good decision of yours. We welcome it. But it is not meant for carrying on any subversive activity. If we made this position quite clear to them, I do not think heaven is going to fall on you.

Shri Yashwant Sinha: Will you please yield for a minute? My simple question is this. We know their position and we know our position. Why was this sentiment not reflected in the Joint Statement when the Pakistani Prime Minister raised it? We included this sentence, why did we not include one more sentence to state our position? This is our point.

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: Shri Yashwant Sinha, you yourself have replied to that question in the National Democratic Alliance's memorandum, which you have submitted to the President, saying that 'this is unilateral'. Your point is that we could have put our viewpoint also, but when you describe the statement as unilateral, you admit that we are not a party to it. You yourself are admitting by using the epithet 'unilateral mentioning' that we are not a party to it. But you could have stated that our position should have been mentioned. That is not the intention. ... (Interruptions)

Shri L.K. Advani: Shri Pranab Mukherjee, you said 'because it is unilateral and he said'. Our objection is why Balochistan is mentioned here which is a Joint India-Pakistan Statement and for the first time in all these years. They have been making this allegation earlier also, and I am sure that when the Prime Minister talked to Shri Gilani, he must have told him that we have nothing to do with it, which has been said by you today and also by the Prime Minister. But why, when this was mentioned in the India-Pakistan Statement, could we not have added our viewpoint also? I am not quoting exactly, but I have with me what he mentioned about Balochistan. But this is true that for the first time, Balochistan has been mentioned in a Joint India-Pakistan Statement agreed by the Prime Ministers. Therefore, my colleague was right when he said yesterday that 'I caution you that this Balochistan will be coming again and again whenever we talk about terrorism and this will be their proof against us that we are also indulging in terrorism, which is absurd, which is bunkum and therefore, never before has Balochistan ever occurred in talks with them.' That is our objection.

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: You may have your objection. You are entitled to have your objection, but what I am trying to point out is that this is a unilateral reference. The perception of Pakistan is not shared by us. You know it very well that umpteen number of times ... (Interruptions) I have not disturbed anybody. Please allow me to make my observations. You are entitled to have your own view. You are not going to change your views by listening to me. So, why are you worried? Let me speak my point of view because after all, everybody is listening to what this sovereign Parliament, their chosen representatives are debating and deliberating upon and I welcome this. As I mentioned that if more and more Foreign Policy, more and more fiscal and financial policy is debated and discussed here, it is better than the local issues or extra-local issues being debated and discussed and taking the time of the sovereign Parliament. It would be much better if we concentrate on the macro issues like this. Therefore it is a good idea that you have your own views, but let me express my view and share it with you. It does not mean that you shall have to accept it. You are free to reject it, but let me speak. I will not take much of your time. My colleague, Shri Krishna will be replying to the debate. Madam, the fourth point which I am trying to say is that the intention is quite clear. We are not going to succumb to the pressure and compromise our position in this. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Ananth Kumar: What is your viewpoint about Balochistan? ... (Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: Shri Ananth Kumar, please do not intervene. Time is running out. ... (Interruptions) (Interruptions) No, Shri Munde. By 3.30 p.m., we shall have to complete because Private Members' Business will start at that time. Today, we have allocated time after 3.30 p.m. to Private Members' Business. Hon. Minister will reply. I will complete in a minute. Please do not disturb me. The short point which I am trying to point out is that there is no question of compromising our position in respect of terrorism. Our Prime Minister has used it more than often that Pakistan must act credibly, verifiably to dismantle the terror mechanisms which are operating from there. That is their primary responsibility. It is better for them, and it is better for us. I am saying this because if they dismantle the terror mechanism, then they will be safe from the terrorist attacks and we will be safe from the terrorist attacks. Therefore, it is better for them; it is better for us; it is better for the humanity; and for the people of this country. Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Smt. Sushma Swaraj (Bharatiya Janata Party): Madam Speaker Pranab da has kept his views in a very impressive way. I would like to ask just one question.....(Interruption)

Madam Speaker: I would suggest that you go back to your seats. ... (Interruptions) You please go back to your seat, and say whatever you have to say from there. ... (Interruptions) Anything that you say from here will not go on record. Anything said in the well of the House will not go on record. Therefore, please go back to your seats. ... (Interruptions) 1457 hours (At this stage, Shri Sudip Bandyopadhyay and some other hon. Members went back to their seats.)

Shri Sudip Bandyopadhyay (Trinamol Congress): Madam, four persons belonging to the minority community and supporters belonging to our political party, namely, Shri Sheikh Jalan, Shri Maltoor Sheikh, Shri Daulat Gazi and Shri Sharafat Hussain and belonging to South 24 Parganas have been brutally killed in the district of South 24 Parganas under the Bhangore Police Station and 35 have been brutally injured. The list is with us. We have drawn the attention of the hon. Shri Pranab Mukherjee; we are drawing the attention of the hon. Prime Minister; and we have drawn the attention of the Home Minister. We would request you to see that the interest, and life and properties of the Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes and the Minorities are protected properly. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Basu Deb Acharia: Madam, it is a State matter. ... (Interruptions) It has happened in the State. ... (Interruptions) How can he bring it in this House? ... (Interruptions)

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members, there are four speakers left. I would give two minutes to each speaker. ... (Interruptions) Yes, please take very little time. ... (Interruptions)

Smt. Sushma Swaraj: Madam chairperson, I would like to ask Pranab da just one question . He said "foreign policy is an extension of our national interest" . You have quoted very well that " foreign policy is an extension of our national interest " I only want to ask one thing that which aspect of national interest is served by the mention of Baluchistan in the joint statement. By delinking terror from composite dialogue, debracketing it, why national interest has got served? If you can clarify just this point then we will accept that foreign policy is an extension of our national interest. ....(Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee : I have nothing to add to whatever I have spoken on this issue. ... (Interruptions)

Madam chairperson : Shri Digvijay Singh

Smt. Sushma Swaraj: We would like to know what national interest is served by this?

Madam Speaker: He has already given his reply. Now, Shri Digvijay Singh. ... ..(Interruptions)

Madam Speaker : He has already given his reply. ....(Interruptions)
He has said whatever he wanted to say. ....(Interruptions)

Please listen, he is saying something. ....(Interruptions)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: India's foreign policy is.....(Interruptions)

Madam Speaker : Shri Digvijay Singh. Please let the Honourable member speak.....(Interruption)

Smt. Sushma Swaraj: Madam Speaker, please let the foreign minister reply.

Madam speaker: Foreign minister will reply. When it is time, he will reply. ....(Interruption)

Shri Pranab Mukherjee: It has been stated, and I am repeating it, namely, that the action against terrorism is independent of any dialogue. A country may have a composite dialogue mechanism and a country may not have a composite dialogue mechanism.

Shri Digvijay Singh (Independent): Madam, I am grateful to you for allowing me to speak. I was listening to the comments made by Shri Pranab Mukherjee very carefully. He started off his presentation very well. From the point where you quoted Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru from the Panchsheel, I will take you back a little from that. I can say this about India's foreign policy that in the year 1927 when Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru represented the Congress Party in the League against Imperialism, at that time the Congress party was the main political party and he went on behalf of Gandhiji to speak there. Now the year is 2009 and there is no change in India's foreign policy from the time of that speech given at the League of Imperialism, governments changed but the policy remained the same, there was no change. We always believe that our foreign policy runs on continuity with only minor changes here and there. Today the circumstances under which we are keeping our point of view before you is with the backdrop of the ghastly events that took place last year following which for the first time there was a split in the minds of the people regarding our foreign policy. In this country we had never had such uncertainties in our mind, what we saw last year in this House after the incidents of last year. It was just not possible that anybody would doubt a statement that was made by the Prime Minister of India. Outside our borders, there are only two symbols; one is our national tricolour and the other is our Indian prime Minister's word because he speaks for 100 crore Indians. And hence it is not possible for me to even think of a situation where anyone can doubt the words of the Indian prime minister.

Madam, the Prime Minister is sitting here, I would only like to ask as to what is it that happened that the people of the country had uncertainty in their minds. It is not doubt but uncertainty and uncertainty because till about 15-20 days back, your language was different and after 15-20 days your language changed. It is normal for people to think that if the Prime Minister's language has changed, then obviously he must have got a new weapon, some new information, some fresh confidence has been instilled. We don't say that there should be no dialogue. In this House itself, knowing a language makes a person speak anything.

.....(Interruptions)

Madam, as you say. If you give permission I will speak, otherwise I will not.

Madam, the prime Minister has already answered. Shri Pranab Mukherjee has also answered. I only want to draw the attention of the Prime Minister, you, the Foreign Minister to 2-3 points. There are lots of people sitting here, Salman Khursheed is sitting here, there have been many instances when both Mr. Salman Khursheed and Shri Atal Behari Vajpayee have together advocated our foreign policy in Geneva. Pranab Mukherjee has himself been Foreign Minister, we all have been used many times, he has himself done it many times. There never used to be discussion or debate on foreign policy because it was unimaginable that anybody would make a foreign policy keeping the national interest aside. You have said rightly that it is a matter of self-interest. I keep before you 2-3 important points. It is not a question of foreign policy but uncertainty in the minds of the people. Everybody has put forth their points about Baluchistan and you have also given clarification in your own way.

For the first time, the people of the country are thinking that do we also create trouble in Baluchistan? It is now on the minds of everybody as to why Baluchistan was mentioned. There is nobody who is more experienced than you. You know very well that this kind of hue and cry was always raised about Baluchistan time and again. But we never paid attention to it. You are saying it is in our national interest but the people are not able to understand why was Baluchistan mentioned. And if it was, what did we say because only one-sided information has come. Everybody is thinking as to why is this one-sided and for what reason? Under whose pressure? Why was this said like this? Have we got some information which we should have said? It is our duty to clear the air on this issue. This is not only the Prime Minister or Mr. Advani's work, it is also our duty to clear the minds of the people because India has only one strength in the world and that is its foreign policy record. ....(Interruption) When we were poor, even then we had an independent foreign policy. Today you have everything, you had promised the world.....(Interruption) We are equal partners in not only the world's fight for democracy but also for independence. ....(Interruption)

Madam, when Mr. Krishna comes for answering he should attempt to tell us why this happened? Because talking and debating it will not get the answer. This parliament is a symbol of the hopes and aspirations of 116 crore people of India and that is why when you keep forth your view here, it should reach the people of the country.

Second point, a bad precedent has been started in your ministry that your officers, bureaucrats are briefing members and the media alike. The parliament session is on and the Prime Minister and the foreign minister are themselves involved in it. The joint statement is not the words of a foreign secretary or an officer, they are the words of the Prime Minister. The time has come when these people are saying that it is not legally binding on us. I would like to tell them that.....(Interruptions)

Till now we used to think that Bihari's English is poor but what English is this about which it is being said that it is bad drafting. Why is this being said? Why are these words being used?

Madam, I would request Shri Krishna to clarify these two points.

Shri Asaduddin Owaisi (All India Majlis E-ittehadul Muslimmen):
Madam speaker, this debate was started by BJP's .....It was asked as to why Baluchistan was mentioned. A lot of points were mentioned. I would like to ask.....(on the Speaker's directions it was not included in the proceedings summary)

Madam Speaker, the second point is the India.....(Interruption)

Madam speaker: Please sit down. ....(Interruption)

.....(Interruption)

Madam speaker, I wanted to say that what the Prime Minister has said.....(Interruption)

Dr. Manmohan Singh has not said....(Interruption)

.....(Interruption)

I am not going to get scared by your threatening. ....(Interruption) Please tell them, not me.

.....(Interruption) I am not going to be scared of you.

.....(Interruption)

Smt. Sushma Swaraj: Madam speaker, I have a point of order.

Madam speaker: Sushma ji, what is your point of order.

Shrimati Sushma Swaraj: Madam, I am on a point of order. My point of order is under Rule 354 of the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Lok Sabha. Rule 354 says, "No speech made in the Council (that means Council of States, Rajya Sabha) shall be quoted in the House (that means this Lok Sabha) unless it is a definite statement of policy by a Minister." There is a restriction under rule 354 that statements made in the Rajya Sabha cannot be quoted in the Lok Sabha and the honourable member started his presentation with a quotation from the other house....(Interruption)

Madam, they did not let me speak at all. They have created such an confusion on one point. BJP has brought up the point as to why the word Islamic was used in respect of Pakistan. Pakistan is not the sole proprietor of Islam, India also has 15 crore Indian Muslims staying here. What is the problem in that? Yes, your ideology, thinking is anti-Islam, that I agree but you cannot say such things about Islam. ....(Interruption)

Madam, the third point I would like to say is.....(Interruption)

Madam, they are not allowing me to talk.....(Interruption)

... (Interruptions)

Madam, please let me finish. ....(Interruption)

.....(Interruption)

The Minister of External Affairs (Shri S.M. Krishan): Madam Speaker, I am grateful to all the hon. Members who have actively participated in the discussion on the recent visit of the Prime Minister to the foreign countries. Certain perceptions have been put forward; certain doubts have been expressed; much of those doubts have been cleared by the effective intervention of the hon. Prime Minister yesterday.

Several Hon. Members: No.

Shri S.M. Krishna: It was further strengthened by another effective intervention by the former Foreign Minister, Shri Pranab Mukherjee just now.

In the NAM Summit at Sharm El Sheikh 118 countries participated, which was a unique event by itself. References were made which were lost in the heat that was generated in the House with reference to Pakistan; but I would like to take the House back to those days of glory, when Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru who truly could be said as the Father of India's Foreign Policy Evolution. He enunciated India's foreign policy. He was the chief architect of the NAM, along with President Tito and Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt. It was in that very land where the non-aligned thoughts, the seeds of non-alignment were sown. In that land again, 118 sovereign nations met. They were not subservient to any other nation; they were independent and they were sovereign. All of them reiterated it in one voice that non-alignment is as relevant as it was during the days of Pandit Nehru.

They also said that they would like to pursue the policy of Non-alignment. Some acquisitions, some insinuations were made that the autonomy of decision making and independence of thought and action had been bartered away. I think the hon. Finance Minister referred to some of the previous incidents. I remember, when the Government of India sought a 5 billion dollars loan from the World Bank it was freely accused that India's sovereignty was being sold and India was becoming subservient to the World Bank which is controlled by the United States of America. What is the situation after 20 years? Have we become subservient to the United States? Is not India pursuing an independent Foreign Policy of its own? That is the question.

Several Hon. Members: No.... (Interruptions)

Shri S.M. Krishna: We have.... (Interruptions) References have been made in the joint statement to a number of issues. In the Presidential Statement, which was accepted by all the 118 nations, a number of issues which are of common concern to countries have been raised and we are subscribers to that document. So, India even today pursues an independent Foreign Policy which is tailored to sub serve our national interest. In fact, our Foreign Policy is an extension of the domestic policy subject to the changes that have come about in our neighbourhood and in the world at large. So, we will have to factor that in, in an emphasis here or an emphasis there, in tailoring our Foreign Policy. That has been done very effectively over a period of time.... (Interruptions)

Shri Shatrughan Sinha (Bharatiya Janata Party): Mr. Minister, please drink some water. .....(Interruptions)

Shri Sanjay Nirupam(Congress): *Do you all not drink water?
.....(Interruptions)*

Madam Speaker: Let the Minister reply.

Shri S.M. Krishna: All of us need water at some point of time. It may be me today and it will be you tomorrow.

Madam, any Foreign Policy will be strong and effective as the domestic consensus behind it. That is the reason why the Government keeps this hon. House repeatedly involved through the Statements as to the direction in which our Foreign Policy is being directed. When the debate takes place any constructive suggestion that comes from there or here, we own it as our own. We have no hesitation. We do not stand on false prestige. Whenever this august House feels our Foreign Policy needs a course correction, we have never hesitated to go in for that course correction.

Well that is what democracy is all about. We stand very firmly on certain very basic concepts of our policy. But the emphasis might keep shifting here and there. So, I will not dwell on Pakistan because there have been two very effective and decisive interventions. I would only touch one or two other points which the hon. Members have raised. One hon. Member talked about Sri Lanka... (Interruptions)

Shrimati Sushma Swaraj: What about Balochistan?

SHRI S.M. KRISHNA: It has been answered... (Interruptions)

Shrimati Sushma Swaraj: It has not been answered. You are going to Sri Lanka but you first answer about Balochistan. Mr. Pranab Mukherjee said that you will answer that. He did not answer about Balochistan....(Interruptions). The question is very specific... (Interruptions) My question was very specific, what national interest was served by the mention of Baluchistan?

Shri S.M. Krishna: I have understood the question. I thought the question had been answered. But if you would like to have an answer, I will give an answer... (Interruptions) ... (Interruptions)

Shri S.M. Krishna: Madam, I need your protection... (Interruptions)

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members, let him complete his reply.

Shri S.M. Krishna: With reference to Balochistan, I think there was a clarification which was made. When the two Prime Ministers met, the question of Balochistan came and we readily agreed. Shrimati Sushma Swaraj: Why?

Shri S.M. Krishna: It is because we had nothing to hide... (Interruptions)
We had nothing to hide.... (Interruptions)

Shri L.K. Advani: Madam Speaker, this is a strange answer. If we had nothing to hide then we should have objected to the inclusion of this word there. For the first time, this has been included. They may have tried earlier also. Furthermore, if it was to be included then we should have said there that India has nothing to do with what is happening in Balochistan. This should also have been said... (Interruptions). I am not surprised that even within the Congress Party, there are demands that the Prime Minister clarifies his position on Balochistan and why has he signed it... (Interruptions)

If somebody reads today's newspaper, let alone the politicians, but foreign policy specialists as well as defence policy analysts, they have all said that neither the Prime Minister nor Mr. Pranab Mukherjee's speech has given any clarification on the delinking or the Baluchistan issue and nor has your statement that you have given now. I feel that after the Prime Minister's statement, you don't have anything to add. And that is why till the time Baluchistan clarification was not asked, you were not willing to speak. I think there is no point in participating in this debate after this point. We all are walking out.....(Interruption)

(Following this, Shri Lal Krishna Advani and some other Honourable members walked out of the House) .....(Interruption)

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members, it is 3.30 p.m. If the House agrees then we will take up the Private Members' Business immediately after the reply of the hon. Minister.

(Following this Shri Mulayam Singh Yadav and some other members walked out of the House)

Shri S.M. Krishna: Madam, most of the points has been covered. Some hon. Members have mentioned about the situation in Sri Lanka at the condition of the internally displaced persons who are lodged in camps in Northern Sri Lanka. As you know, the hon. Prime Minister had a meeting with President Rajapakse on the sidelines of the ... (Interruptions) In the meeting that the hon. Prime Minister had with the President of Sri Lanka the question of settlement and rehabilitation of civilians who have become hapless victims of the conflict in Sri Lanka came up and the Prime Minister reiterated India's willingness to make possible early return to normal lives of the Tamil IDPs in Sri Lanka.

Madam Speaker: Hon. Members, please be quiet. ... (Interruptions)

Shri S.M. Krishna: The President of Sri Lanka assured us that he shared these goals and his commitment to complete the resettlement process in next 180 days. We have impressed upon the President of Sri Lanka that this is of urgent importance from the Indian point of view and then it is a humanitarian effort which the Sri Lankan Government will have to go through. The Government of India have already announced a sum of Rs. 500 crore and then the hon. Prime Minister has been gracious enough to say that if need be he is willing to give more for the resettlement of the Sri Lankans.

We are also working with the Sri Lankan authorities and the international community to ensure that practical, meaningful devolution of power and other arrangements are taking place which will enable all communities to live at home and live in peace and dignity within the framework of a united Sri Lanka. As regards climate change, some references have been made. The hon. Prime Minister, yesterday, has spelt out India's basic policy. We are going to pursue that line even when we will meet in Copenhagen where an International Conference is to take place. With reference to the end use monitoring, some Members have asked about the arrangements. An impression is sought to be created by some quarters that our Defence installations are going to be open for American inspection and verification. I think nothing could be farther from truth than this statement. The stated position about the end use monitoring system is, when we buy some high end Defence equipment from United States America after arriving at a mutual consent, we decide by mutual consent about the venue where the inspection is going to take place. It is not as if the United State authorities can walk into any Defence installation and then keep a tab on us. Let me make it very clear that all that we have agreed on the end use monitoring arrangements will be henceforth referred to in letters of acceptance, as the hon. Prime Minister clarified yesterday and there has never been a thought of our sovereignty being compromised. The arrangements that we have agreed are fully in consonance with our sovereignty and dignity. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Lalu Prasad: Madam speaker, everybody has gone. I will also walk out.

044. Statement by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in the Rajya Sabha on working of Ministry of External Affairs.

New Delhi, July 31, 2009.

At the outset, I would like to thank members who have so actively participated in this important discussion. Very important issues raised by Hon'ble Members including Shri Arun Jaitley, Shri Arun Shourie and Shri N.K. Singh.

The dynamics of India's foreign policy flow directly from the aspirations of our people. Inspired by the vision of our founding fathers, our foreign policy is distinguished by a tradition of continuity and consensus.

The ethos of our foreign policy

At the core of this continuity is autonomy of decision-making and independence of thought and action, and upholding of the values of pluralism, democracy and secularism. From this bedrock of values came our prominent role in the Non Aligned Movement which was recently reaffirmed during our attendance and participation in the 15th NAM Summit in Egypt from 15-16 July. This same bedrock remains today as we seek to creatively respond to new challenges and opportunities. The other key elements of this continuity are our belief in friendly relations with all countries, resolution of conflicts by peaceful means and an approach marked by maturity and balance in the conduct of international relations. We have never abdicated our international responsibilities.

In the new century, against the backdrop of new challenges that dot the international landscape, these core principles, in particular the autonomy of our decision-making, have enabled India to successfully pursue a multi-dimensional foreign policy of seeking strategic engagement, partnership and dialogue with all major global players. We have been able to do so without creating any contradiction or hyphenation between one set of relations and another. We are more connected with the world today than ever before in the past.

The challenges of Foreign Policy today

India's steady ascendance as an economic power has expanded her circle of interaction and engagement with the rest of the world. One of the main challenges of our foreign policy lies in creating and maintaining a regional and international environment which would enable us to sustain a high rate of economic growth, create more opportunities for Indian entrepreneurship and enable India to realize her vast, latent potential.

The pursuit of enhanced trade, investment inflows, technology transfers, energy security and other economic imperatives has become an overarching imperative of our foreign policy. At the same time, India's own established capabilities, particularly in the field of some of the frontier technologies like space, information technology, biotechnology and pharmaceuticals, and her frontline role in the global knowledge economy have imparted a new confidence and strength to our foreign policy initiatives.

To achieve and accelerate India's developmental transformation through enhanced interaction with the global economy, a neighbourhood policy that ensures a peaceful periphery, and to continuously seek a supportive international environment, therefore, remain the fundamental objective of India's foreign policy.

The working of our foreign policy in our neighbourhood

With this objective in mind, a major focus of Indian foreign policy over the years has been the establishment and consolidation of good neighbourly relations with the countries in South Asia. In this context, India has worked for the evolution of SAARC into an effective organisation that will promote meaningful regional integration. At the bilateral level, India has significant economic assistance programmes to assist the governments of Bhutan and Nepal in their development efforts. We have provided full support to the peace process in Nepal. We are fully engaged with Nepal, through a regular exchange of high level visits and regular meetings of institutional mechanisms at various levels with Nepal.

Despite the terrorist attack on the Indian Embassy in Kabul in July 2008 and continued security threats to the personnel of our Embassy and Consulates in Afghanistan and to those implementing development projects there, the Government of India is committed to provide assistance to the government and people of Afghanistan in their reconstruction effort. Our developmental and reconstruction assistance programmes are widely appreciated by the Government and people of Afghanistan.

The Sri Lankan issue was raised by Dr. K. Malaisamy and Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan. In Sri Lanka, we have seen a new phase in internal developments. We are prepared to assist the Government of Sri Lanka in the recovery of war ravaged areas in the North and East of the country and to help alleviate the humanitarian problems of the large numbers of the local population in the IDP camps, so that they are able to lead normal lives once again. We are contributing substantially to this humanitarian effort including setting-up of a field hospital at Vavuniya, supply of shelter material, despatch of demining teams and supply of more than 1.7 lakhs family packs of food and relief supplies. Our Prime Minister has announced Rs. 500 crores assistance, and if need be, he has also promised to increase the aid quantum.

No discussion on our neighbourhood policy would be complete without reference to our relations with Pakistan. The peoples of our two countries must be allowed to prosper in an atmosphere of peace. At the same time, we cannot, and will not, be oblivious to the continued threat of terrorism emanating from Pakistan. Progress is not possible in our dialogue with Pakistan in an atmosphere vitiated by violence or the threat to use violence. The Joint Statement of July 17, 2009 encapsulates this view and standpoint that any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan can only follow the concrete fulfilment of their commitments not to allow their territory to be used for terrorist activities against India.

My esteemed friend, Shri Arun Shourie referred to Pakistan in some detail in the course of his speech. He is now advocating a policy towards Pakistan that his own government did not follow. He accuses us of having removed the pressure on Pakistan to act against terrorism and of having lowered our expectations. I simply do not see how this is so. Let me assure him that, as the Prime Minister has said, he and I have left the Pakistani leadership in no doubt whatsoever that we expect action against the perpetrators of Mumbai and other terrorist attacks against India, the dismantling of the infrastructure of terrorism in Pakistan and the prevention of such future attacks.

I welcome the fact that we debate, in a democratic manner, our policy towards Pakistan. But to make a point, or oppose the government, let us not give more credence to what others say over what Prime Minister and our own government have formally stated.

We are not here to question each others' motives. We are united against terrorism period. But equally we will continue the consistent policy towards Pakistan which includes dialogue in the steps we will take provided Pakistan takes unequivocal steps.

Shri Biswajit Daimary and Shri S. S. Ahluwalia raised the issue of development of North East, and its role in our foreign policy. North East has been an important focus area for the Ministry. Apart from the Kaladan Multi-Modal Transit Transport Project to connect ports in India's eastern seaboard to the North Eastern States via Myanmar and the Tamu-Kalewa-Kalemyo (TKK) road connecting Manipur to Myanmar, India is also taking several steps to enhance engagement of North Eastern states with Myanmar. We are opening up trade at border points with Myanmar. In our discussions with Bangladesh, we have accorded the highest priority to enhanced connectivity between Bangladesh and North Eastern states.

Shri Tariq Anwar mentioned our 'Look East' policy. Our various initiatives in ASEAN, East Asia Summit [ASEAN, India, New Zealand, Australia, Japan, China and South Korea], BIMSTEC [Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-Sectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation comprises Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Myanmar, Nepal, Sri Lanka and Thailand] and Mekong Ganga Cooperation [India, Cambodia, Lao PDR, Myanmar, Thailand and Vietnam] have great potential in rejuvenating our historical and civilizational links with our neighbours in the east. With the rapidly changing economic circumstances in the world, we see great opportunities in advancing the process of our economic integration with the ASEAN and other countries in the region. In this activity, we have been coordinating closely with our Ministry of Development of North Eastern Region.

China

With China, India has a strategic and cooperative partnership. We have an established architecture for dialogue through which all issues of common interest and concern are discussed. Bilateral trade has grown significantly and a target of US $ 60 billion by 2010 has been jointly set for such trade. The "Shared Vision for the 21st Century" signed by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh with his Chinese counterpart in January 2008 has added a regional and multi-dimensional aspect to our bilateral ties. Certainly, there are outstanding issues between India and China. The Special Representatives are discussing the Boundary Question and both countries have agreed to seek a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable settlement to this issue. The matter, of course, is complex and requires time and lots of patience. Meanwhile, our endeavour is to ensure that peace and tranquillity are maintained in the border areas.

An Hon'ble member raised the issue of construction of a dam by China on the Brahmaputra. We have instituted a mechanism of Expert Level Talks on water resources between India and China to focus on issues such as exchange of flood control data and emergency response management in Brahmaputra and Satluj Rivers.

Gulf Region

The Gulf region is our neighbour across the Arabian sea and has a special place in India's external relations framework. India has had close civilizational contacts, trade and exchanges with this region spanning several centuries. The Gulf region has left an indelible imprint on our history, on our culture and on our civilization.

India's relations with GCC countries have evolved and have been strengthened over the years. India's "look-west" policy directed at the GCC is reflective of our desire to deepen our relations with the countries of the Gulf and we are fashioning a structure of multifaceted cooperation covering all sectors. The Gulf region is an area of special focus in our foreign policy. It forms part of India's strategic neighbourhood, is an important source of energy, home to over four and a half million Indians and a major trading partner. India enjoys excellent relations with these countries and bilateral engagement during this period has witnessed further growth and diversification. There has been intensification of high-level interactions in the recent past.

Palestine

Some Hon'ble members have raised the issue of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. India has a consistent and unwavering record of support for the Palestinian cause since the days of our freedom struggle. Our policy is in line with United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, the "Quartet" (US-Russia-EU-UN) Roadmap and the Arab Peace Initiative. India supports a united, independent, viable, sovereign state of Palestine with East Jerusalem as its capital, living within secure and recognised borders side by side at peace with Israel. We have expressed concern for the continuing expansion of Israeli settlements in occupied Palestinian territories. The $10 million grant made in March 2009 as budget support for the Palestine National Authority is but one of many examples of India's long history of assistance for Palestine. During the visit of the President of the Palestinian National Authority Mahmoud Abbas to India in October 2008, the foundation stone of the Palestine Embassy in New Delhi was laid, which is now near completion. This Embassy building is a gift of the government and people of India to Palestine. We also assist Palestine in developing its human resource through the ITEC programme.

As Hon'ble Members are aware, diplomatic relations with Israel were established in 1992. Our relations with Israel are varied and mutually beneficial.

Iran

Shri Ram Jethmalani raised the issue of our relations with Iran. We attach importance to our relations with Iran - these relations are civilizational and historical, but equally the relationship should be a contemporary and modern one.

India and the U.S.

Several Hon'ble members have raised the issue of our relations with USA. I would like to underline here that our relations with USA are not at the cost of our relations with any other country. India-US relations have been transformed in recent years and the bilateral engagement extends across a wide spectrum which includes science and technology, energy, counter-terrorism, defence, security, trade and commerce, education, space among other issues. A major development was the signing of the India-US Civil Nuclear Agreement in October 2008. This landmark agreement has been followed by similar agreements with other countries for civil nuclear cooperation. A clearly defined architecture for dialogue was announced during the recent visit of US Secretary of State to India this month. The firm foundation provided by this robust bilateral engagement has enabled the India-US strategic partnership to strengthen itself in areas of global engagement. The two countries interact closely on global issues of common concern such as Energy Security, Disarmament and Non-proliferation, international peace and security, multilateral trade negotiations and the G20 Process.

E.U.M.

Some Hon'ble members have asked about the End Use Monitoring (EUM) arrangements that we have agreed with United States. All Governments have arrangements to ensure that defence related weapons and equipments that are transferred do not fall into the wrong hands and are only for legitimate use. We too do so for our exports of such materials. Successive Governments of India have entered into these arrangements with supplier states, including the US, for several years. With the US, which has its own legal requirements, we have entered into ad-hoc arrangements for individual supplies in the past. What we have now done is to agree on the End Use Monitoring arrangements that would henceforth be referred to in Letters of Acceptance of Indian procurements of US defence technology and equipments. These provide for joint consultations on modalities and in no way compromise our sovereignty, or limit our sovereign choice of whether, where and what weapons we choose to buy for our national defence. The arrangements that we have agreed are fully in consonance with our sovereignty and dignity.

Responses to global economic crisis

In the last two decades, we have expanded the scope and depth of economic and strategic interaction with different countries, groups and regions including China, Russia, the USA, Japan, EU, South East Asia, Central Asia, IBSA, BRIC, the G5 and G8. This enhanced interaction with the global community reflects India's growing stature on the international stage.

Against the background of the global financial and economic crisis, India's participation in global groupings like the G-20, G-8, the G-5 outreach group and BRIC has been highly valued. At the recent G8-G5 outreach meeting at L'Aquila, our assessment and views were heard with attention and deeply appreciated. Our view as articulated by our Prime Minister was that any future growth of the global economy is sustainable only on the strength of domestic stimulus packages which aim to make the poor and the youth bankable, that the old pattern of economic growth driven by consumption in the USA is no longer sustainable, and that the first and over-riding priority of developing countries like India is economic and social development and poverty eradication.

Another example of our increased global engagement is India's membership of the BRIC countries (Brazil, Russia, India and China). The first stand-alone formal summit meeting of the four BRIC countries was held in June 2009 at Yekaterinburg in Russia. The main issues for discussion amongst the leaders were the implications of the current global financial and economic crisis and the potential for cooperation among the four BRIC countries. These processes also give us greater opportunities to shape the new global balance of power. The ongoing economic crisis has highlighted the need for redistributing power within international financial institutions like the World Bank, the IMF. Such redistribution needs to be extended to political organs of global governance such as the UN Security Council.

Some Hon'ble members (Shri Mohammad Amin and Shri Tariq Anwar) expressed appreciation of India's active participation in the IBSA [grouping of India, Brazil and South Africa] and BRIC. India has been alive to the changing global realities of today and has been quite quick to grasp their import. Our recent experience with groupings, such as these, has been that the emerging economies have considerable potential for not only developing synergies between themselves but also for making an impact on the shaping the outcomes of the international debate on critical issues of concern to all of us. This has implications for the future shape of the world order which is, already, in a flux for a variety of reasons. With such an active diplomatic interaction, we feel quite confident that India and other countries will be able to protect our interest in the World Trade Organisation negotiations about which some apprehensions were expressed.

ENR Technologies

With regard to the specific issue of a reported ban on transfer of enrichment and reprocessing technologies, the recent G-8 statement at the L'Aquila Summit, which is a political statement and not a legally binding document, refers to discussions at the NSG, which are ongoing. No decision has been taken by the NSG. Government has been in regular touch with the NSG Troika (past, current and future Chairman) and with key NSG countries. As part of this dialogue there was an India-NSG Troika meeting on 11 May 2009. During this meeting the NSG delegation was made aware of our position and concerns. The NSG delegation said that they would convey these to the Group. It is India's expectation that our international partners in civil nuclear cooperation will implement the bilateral agreements that we have entered into.

Hon'ble Deputy Chairman

Ties with developing countries

India continues to strengthen its partnership with other developing countries in Africa, Latin America, Central and South East Asia. India's long standing historical relationship with Africa acquired further substance and even deeper relevance with the first ever India-Africa Forum Summit held in New Delhi in April 2008. At the summit India renewed its deep commitment to contribute and work with our African partners for the development of Africa. India is also making strenuous efforts to cultivate stronger bonds with the countries of the Latin American and Caribbean region and to explore the enormous opportunities that exist for trade and economic interaction with this region. Under the ITEC and the SCAAP programmes, India has been assisting countries in Africa, Latin America, Asia and Eurasia in the field of capacity building and around 5,000 professionals from 158 developing countries have attended various training and educational courses in India in areas of interest and advantage to them.

Indian students in Australia

Hon'ble Members have expressed concern about the attack on Indian students in Australia. The issue has been taken up at the highest levels of the Australian Government. The Government of Australia have conveyed to us their firm commitment to ensuring the safety and security of Indian students in Australia. Some specific steps have been taken by the Australian government, including launch of a police operation specifically to investigate the incidents of attacks on students; provision of 24 hour hotline (in Hindi and English) by a Community Reference Group to provide support, information and advice to Indian students who are victims of crime; and setting up of a Police Community Reference Group to improve communications between the police and the student community. More importantly, the Australian Government have also stated that they are considering the possibility of amending the existing law to enlarge the definition of offence to include race, religion, ethnicity and nationality related violence against people or individuals. The proposed amendment would strengthen the police response to the attacks against Indian students.

Haj Pilgrimage

Hon'ble Deputy Chairman, performing Haj is one of the holiest and most cherished dreams for our Muslim brothers and sisters. For my Ministry and indeed the Government of India, facilitating the Haj pilgrimage year after year is among the most elaborate year-long exercise and an important task undertaken by us both in India and abroad. We have been striving to bring about improvements in Haj pilgrimage management to make it more comfortable and affordable.

An Hon'ble Member (Shri Gopal Vyas) referred to the size of the Haj goodwill delegation. The Haj goodwill delegation comprises of eminent personalities, sent to assess the Haj arrangements. It is not possible to lay down strict criteria for selecting leading, eminent community members. Some leading members of the delegation also attend the dinner traditionally hosted by His Majesty the King of Saudi Arabia. As regards family members of the delegation members, Government of India does not make any arrangements not does it pay for their travel or stay. As regards rationalizing the size of the Goodwill delegation, the matter is under consideration.

An Hon'ble Member (Shri Malihabadi) raised the issue of waiver of service tax being levied on private operators arranging Haj visits, since the services are rendered abroad. We too have received representations from the private operators, and the matter will be referred to the Ministry of Finance for their consideration. As regards setting up a 'Haj Corporation', wide-ranging reforms in the area of Haj management are being examined.

Passport Seva project

My Ministry has launched the Passport Seva Project in August 2007, which when completed will substantially improve the level and quality of services offered to citizens for passport related matters. This is one of the largest e-governance initiatives that Government of India has undertaken. The Project envisages the creation of 77 Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) across the country, the creation of call centre operating 24x7 in 17 languages, and a centralized nationwide computerized system for issuance of passports. The launch of pilot sites is expected in October 2009 at Bangalore (covering the whole of Karnataka) and Chandigarh (covering parts of states of Punjab & Haryana and the Union Territory of Chandigarh). The project is scheduled to be rolled out throughout the country in three waves and expected to be completed by June 2010.

Administration

Some Members (Shri Arun Shourie, Shri N.K. Singh and Shri Naresh Gujral) raised administrative issues related to my Ministry. I fully endorse the very valid points made by Hon'ble Members on the continuing need for the Ministry of External Affairs to respond with the spirit of creativity and innovation to the requirements and challenges imposed by a rapidly changing world situation. We remain ever sensitive to the need for constantly reviewing the enhancing the human resource strengths of the Ministry, providing the requisite budgetary enhancement and giving importance to the initial training and mid-career training of our diplomats and officials. Mid-career training has now been made mandatory for an officer to be promoted to Joint Secretary and Additional Secretary levels. We have undertaken a major overhaul of our promotion policies. We are also augmenting our manpower through selective and need-based induction of specialist officers from other Ministries and Departments into MEA. Approval of the Union Cabinet has also been secured for a forward looking expansion of the officer cadre of the Ministry. The needs of our commercial diplomacy and the projection of India's soft power and civilizational values are receiving particular attention in this scenario.

The need for constantly infusing the working of foreign policy with new ideas and concepts is also fully recognized. The Indian Council for World Affairs is a research institution that works closely with the Ministry in this regard by providing an effective forum for exchange of ideas and identifying areas for further study and research that involve discussion and debate with scholars outside the government. Our Missions abroad also interact on a systematic basis with foreign universities and India Study Programmes so that India's viewpoint is effectively articulated in order to bridge information and awareness gaps.

I welcome the constructive suggestions that we have heard from several members. Shri Arun Shourie said that we should quadruple the size of our Foreign Service and our foreign aid budget. Shri N.K. Singh spoke of doubling the IFS. The Cabinet decided last year on a five year programme to double the size of our diplomatic cadre. We will certainly also look at boosting the financial resources available to our diplomacy, as the tasks and demands on us grow.

Shri Ravi Shanker Prasad noted the need for training in neighbouring country languages. Ministry is training more IFS officers in neighbouring country languages. Our officers possess considerable language skills that are put to constant use in the conduct of our diplomacy.

Sardar Tarlochan Singh raised the Sikh Turban issue in France. The Government of India have made a number of demarches at the highest levels to the French Government conveying the sensitivity of the issue and the need to find a satisfactory solution. Prime Minister had raised this issue in his recent meeting with President Sarkozy of France. The French President assured the Prime Minister that nobody in France will be prevented from wearing the turban. As regards restrictions on the use of turbans by the Sikh community in state funded schools, as well as while getting photographed for official French documents, an Aide Memoire suggesting possible solutions has been handed over.

Shri Gopal Vyas had raised the matter of the Savarkar memorial in Marseilles. The matter is being pursued by our Embassy in France with the office of the Mayor of Marseilles on a regular basis. It has been conveyed by the concerned French officials that they need to examine some previous records to ascertain the current status of the matter. However, there has been a delay in this due to the displacement of the office of the Mayor of Marseilles from its original location due to damage caused by catastrophic storms in 1998. We are continuing to pursue the issue with the local authorities in Marseilles.

Some Hon'ble members raised the issue of public and cultural diplomacy. The Indian Council for Cultural Relations already has 21 cultural centres abroad, and 15 more new cultural centres are on the anvil, with one in Tokyo to be inaugurated shortly this year. The process of identification of land for a centre in Washington is underway.

Hon'ble Deputy Chairman,

I have tried to present a picture of some of the more significant achievements of the MEA in the last one year. The list has been of necessity selective and has not covered many other areas of India's foreign relations. At the same time, the achievements mentioned will, I trust, convey, a clear picture of the positive trends in India's interaction with the world's major powers and our development cooperation with other developing countries. As already stated there are several challenges also being faced by Indian foreign policy including the destabilizing effects of cross-border terrorism and the world financial crisis which has inevitably affected the domestic economy even though the negative effects on our economy have been relatively less than in some other countries. It has always been the MEA's endeavour to follow a dynamic foreign policy that responds effectively to changes in the international environment and is sensitive to India's developmental needs.

Thank You.

045. Statement by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on assumption of office at the Ministry of External Affairs.
New Delhi, August 1, 2009.

I have before me a complex and yet fascinating assignment. I strongly believe that our diplomacy and our diplomats play a vital role in promoting the national interest and safeguarding our national goals of development in an atmosphere of peace and security. Our diplomats today work with dedication and professionalism in some of the world's most challenging environments. Our foreign service counts among the best in the world. Today, in a rapidly evolving world situation, the task is to further augment our diplomatic and professional capabilities as we are called upon to play an even more prominent role in world affairs. This, will be an important area of focus in my new responsibilities. The foreign policy interests of our nation encompass a number of areas, which are both regional and global, and which concern relations with our neighbours and the world beyond. Economic diplomacy and public diplomacy are also issues that demand increased attention. We are called upon as diplomats to deal with a number of these issues, at any one given time, in a manner that is focused, mature and balanced, that is persuasive and has vision and long term perspective. This is an absorbing task and I look forward to it with great hope and optimism.

046. Address by Admiral Sureesh Mehta, PVSM, ADC, Chairman COSC and Chief of Naval Staff on the theme of “India’s National Security Challenges – An Armed Forces Overview” organized by the National Maritime Foundation.

New Delhi, August 10, 2009.

Admiral Arun Prakash (Chairman National Maritime Foundation),

Chief of the Air Staff (Air Chief Marshal PV Naik),

Mr Raj Liberhan (Chairman India Habitat Centre),

Comde Uday Bhaskar (Director National Maritime Foundation),

Members of the NMF and Habitat Centre,

Distinguished Guests, Senior Officers of the Armed Forces, Friends from the Media, Ladies and Gentlemen...

2. I am indeed very delighted to be here this evening at the invitation of the National Maritime Foundation, to share a few thoughts on our country’s national security challenges. The India Habitat Centre and the NMF deserve our unqualified appreciation for periodically conducting lectures and brain-storming sessions that focus our thinking on core national security issues. It is also a great pleasure to see so many friends and erstwhile colleagues as well as distinguished professionals from many walks of life in the audience, whose thoughts and actions significantly impact our national security outlook. Therefore, more than what I have to say, I look forward with much anticipation, to hearing your comments and observations at the end of my talk. I am confident that by the time we are through, there would be valuable ‘takeaways’ for all of us.

3. Since the subject of National Security is immense in its scope and expanse, to even attempt a complete treatment of all issues involved would be decidedly unwise. Therefore, I propose to speak for about 45 minutes on certain key aspects of national security that impact the functioning of the Armed Forces and leave social, economic and environmental dimensions out of the ambit of today’s discourse.

Defining Security

4. Let me first make some very brief comments about the concept of ‘Security’. The traditional view of security focussed on the application of force at the state level and was therefore a fairly narrow view, hinging on military security. It is now widely acknowledged that there is more to security than purely military factors. Today's definition of security acknowledges political, economic, environmental, social and human among other strands that impact the concept of security. In the most basic terms, the concern for security of the lowest common denominator of every society, namely the 'human being', has resulted in the development of the concept of 'human security', which focuses on the individual. Therefore, the definition of security is definitely broad – and is related to the ability of the state to perform the function of protecting the well-being of its people. This formulation harks back to the days of Chanakya and Arthashastra.

6. However, the problem with such a broad definition of security is that anything that generates anxiety or threatens the quality of life gets labelled as a 'security problem', with a consequent loss of focus. In a democracy, it is for the elected government to provide this priority and focus, as only after this, a coherent National Security Strategy can be articulated. I am glad to learn that this exercise has commenced, and is being steered by the NSAB.

Managing Our Own Rise to Global Prominence

7. We often hear that our rise to global prominence is inevitable. It is an incontestable fact that the significance of India as a rising power is being widely acknowledged, as has been witnessed by several events in the recent past, the most defining of which has perhaps been the inking of the Agreement on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with the United States. Our growing economic status fuelled by a 300 million strong middle class, the demographic advantage of a burgeoning 'young population', our increasing ventures into high-technology areas such as Space, and future projections of national growth peg us amongst the world's top 5 economies by 2020. That is just 11 years away.

8. The professionalism and military might of the Armed Forces of India are respected the world over. The very recent launch of our very own nuclear submarine 'Arihant' has also sent out a strong signal of our desire to acquire the appropriate strategic military technology and capability. Despite our several internal challenges and diversities, we are 'rock solid' as a democratic country, surrounded by an extended periphery of varying instability. It is therefore not surprising that the role of a 'natural' regional power is expected of us. Our aspirations for inclusion as a permanent member of the UN Security Council and for a greater voice in international diplomacy are a result of these developments.

9. However, there is a sense that we may not have done adequately rigorous thinking on how to 'manage' our pre-ordained rise to global prominence. With the realisation of our aspirations and greater international recognition will come many more additional responsibilities. The country cannot afford to be indifferent and non-committal on any regional or global issue – we must have an objective 'national interest assessment' on all questions of importance. As military forces of India, we would be expected to function as instruments of peace and stability in this rather fragile environment of the Indian Ocean Region. We have to get our 'hands dirty' in addressing common concerns in our respective domains. This will call for increased participation in peace operations, efforts such as anti-piracy as also capacity-building and capability enhancement of smaller and economically weaker nations which look up to us, for support and security. We must also be seen far away from our shores, working with friendly nations and shaping perceptions, in furtherance of India's foreign policy. Quite evidently, the Navy would lead efforts of military diplomacy, given the medium in which it operates and the distinctive characteristics of its platforms. If we pursue a meaningful foreign policy to advance national objectives – as we do - then the military instrument can complement this collective endeavour.

Coping with China

10. It is quite evident that coping with China will certainly be one of our primary challenges in the years ahead. China is in the process of 'consolidating' its comprehensive national power and creating formidable military capabilities. Once that is done, China is likely to be more assertive on its claims, especially in its immediate neighbourhood. Our 'trust deficit' with China can never be liquidated unless our boundary problems are resolved. China's known propensity for 'intervention in space' and 'cyber-warfare' would also be major planning considerations in our strategic and operational thinking.

11. Common sense dictates that Cooperation with China would be preferable to Competition or Conflict, as it would be foolhardy to compare India and China as equals. China's GDP is more than thrice that of ours and its per capita GDP is 2.2 times our own. China's early steps to liberalise its economy and invest heavily to modernise its physical infrastructure gave it a substantial edge over India, and made China a more preferred destination for FDI. India's annual defence expenditure (approx $30 Bn for 2008-09) is less than half of what China spends on defence. China's official figure is under $ 40 billion but it is widely believed that China actually spends more than twice as much. RAND Corporation, the US DIA and other studies peg China's defence spending to be anything between $ 70 billion to $ 200 billion. Whether in terms of GDP, defence spending or any other economic, social or development parameter, the gap between the two is just too wide to bridge (and getting wider by the day). In military terms, both conventional and non-conventional, we neither have the capability nor the intention to match China, force for force. These are indeed sobering thoughts and therefore our strategy to deal with China would need to be in consonance with these realities.

12. The economic penalties resulting from a military conflict would have grave consequences for both nations. It would therefore, undoubtedly be in both our interests, to cooperate with each other in mutually beneficial endeavours, and ensure that the potential for conflict is minimised. This would require pro-active economic, diplomatic, cultural and people-to-people engagement. Our relations with other major powers, notably USA, Russia, Japan and other East Asian nations need to be nurtured and leveraged to this end. Our growing relations with South East and East Asian countries would increase opportunities for cooperative engagement with China as well. Since resolution of the border problems, autonomy of Tibet, the China-Pakistan connection, competition for strategic space in the Indian Ocean and management of water resources would be the prime causative factors for any potential tension with China, our diplomatic focus on these issues would have to be maintained.

13. On the military front, our strategy to deal with China must include reducing the military gap and countering the growing Chinese footprint in the Indian Ocean Region. The traditional or 'attritionist' approach of matching 'Division for Division' must give way to harnessing modern technology for developing high situational awareness and creating a reliable stand-off deterrent.

The Non-state Actor

14. Today, we have come to live in an era characterised by the rise of sinister nonstate forces which have redefined security responses the world over. We have witnessed an even more worrying phenomenon of the occasional coalescing of the 'State' with some 'non-State' entities which has created an evil-hybrid. This hybrid, to my mind, has been at the very root of the tragic events in Mumbai in November 2008.

Where should we direct our security efforts? Towards the State-sponsor or the non-State entity? How do we expose the linkages, if any? We have been grappling with this problem for some time now with no satisfactory solution emerging.

15. Asia today, is witnessing the historical and simultaneous rise of at least four major powers namely, India, China, Japan and the ten countries of ASEAN. Even in these recessionary times, the economic performances of India, China and Indonesia are quite impressive. On the other hand, Asia is also the ideological crucible of some of the world's ominous non-state forces. Maintaining economic growth, social development and harmony in the face of such disruptive forces will be a thorny problem for many years to come.

Responses to Threats

16. This is a formidable challenge and no country, however large or powerful, has the wherewithal to insulate itself from such omnipresent threats, of which terrorism stoked by distorted religious radicalism is the latest and most grotesque manifestation. Other universal concerns include threats from traffickers of drugs, arms, human beings, organised poachers, ships that clandestinely discharge oil and toxic cargo into the sea or onto the shores of unsuspecting and ill-informed states, mercenaries and modern day pirates. In addition, there are several 'non-traditional security threats' as well. These common challenges can only be faced through the common resolve of like-minded states, facilitated through multilateral structure as well as opportunities and mechanisms for constructive engagement. It will need a transformation in the way we think, and in the way we look at one another. It would also require those nations which have the necessary resources and wherewithal to take the lead in ensuring all forms of security to life, trade and property. Concerted efforts at capability-enhancement and capacitybuilding of the smaller countries of the region, through active assistance of larger neighbours would be crucial to such efforts in the long term.

Shaping our Immediate Neighbourhood

17. Specifically, we have to be mindful of the need to assist our smaller neighbours in helping themselves. Our capability-enhancement and capacity-building initiatives with Sri Lanka, Seychelles, Maldives and Mauritius could be enhanced to a much greater degree, without the need for any kind of 'quid pro quo'. I am convinced that as India grows in economic and military stature, it would have to take upon itself, the role of further enabling its neighbours in ways that would not only enhance their own security, but contribute positively to regional stability as well. On the Navy-to-Navy level, the Indian Ocean Naval Symposium or IONS, which was launched in February last year, is a significant military maritime construct to bring together regional navies and aimed at addressing common concerns. Our diplomatic utterances with regard to our maritime neighbours must be backed by cohesive engagement. This requires much greater integration of thought and action between the Ministries of External Affairs, Defence and the Indian Armed Forces. Our maritime neighbours are the gateways to our strategic frontiers. We need to engage them as much as they need our presence and support. It would be imprudent of us to leave voids in this strategic neighbourhood and watch others extend their influence in our backyard.

Securing Our Maritime Borders

18. A word on coordination of maritime security closer to our coast. Preventing ingress of terrorists from the sea is an abiding challenge. Our long and porous coastline and several island territories, many of which are uninhabited, offer avenues for infiltration of men and material into our heartland, as well as safe havens for clandestine activities. Intrusions via the sea are extremely difficult to prevent with our current state of material and organisational preparedness, as we were rudely shocked to realise, when the perpetrators of the Mumbai terror attacks of 26 Nov 2008 breached the shores of Mumbai with impunity. With a host of ministries and agencies being stake holders in the maritime arena, any attempt at coastal security will warrant a serious 'Whole-of-Government' approach, and robust coordination. The entire sequence of surveillance extending out well beyond our Exclusive Economic Zone, suspicion indication, risk and threat assessments and finally investigation and prosecution is a very complex process, demanding a high level of situational awareness, rapid response and total synergy between all concerned enforcement agencies. This kind of a capability is also technology-intensive, and obviously very expensive to set up and maintain. However, it must be done in the interest of national security, if we are to prevent intrusions and attacks through the sea route. Our acute consciousness of 'turf guarding' must give way to a more synergistic way of functioning. A modest beginning has been made, which has to be sustained through concerted efforts of all stake holders, adequate funding and most of all, public awareness – which is why fora like the Habitat Centre are important.

Internal Security

19. I also need to flag our growing involvement in internal security tasks. Over the past decade and a half, 'internal security' requirements have grown phenomenally. There are unrests of various shades and hues in different states of our country, borne out of equally diverse causative factors. The addressing of these causes and maintenance of order are, nearly in all cases, a matter of internal governance and therefore, squarely within the purview of the civil administration and the police forces.

The rampant spread of Left-Wing Extremism is particularly worrying and tackling the problem requires a well-thought out strategy. However, the increasing demand on the Armed Forces to assume 'law and order' responsibilities is clearly an undesirable trend.

While 'aid to civil authority' is a mandated role of the Armed Forces and they will deliver whenever ordered, this must always be a 'last resort' and 'temporary' measure to be expeditiously withdrawn when the critical need is met. The Armed Forces must never be seen as being used 'against' our own population – the irreversible damage of such action is there for all of us to see in our neighbourhood.

Intelligence

20. Much has also been reported about our handling of intelligence in the past and also in the aftermath of the 1999 Kargil War and more recently, the Mumbai terror attacks. Our intelligence agencies need to be more focussed towards long term intelligence forecasting and therefore, must direct efforts towards anticipatory security planning – predicated on actionable intelligence inputs, in addition to immediate and short-term requirements. Cohesion amongst intelligence agencies and sharing of intelligence in a far more integrated manner is an operational necessity. Integration between all organs of government dealing with intelligence and seamless acquisition, processing of strategic, operational and tactical intelligence and its timely dissemination is of essence. Information exchange mechanisms with other friendly countries also need to be facilitated to enhance domain awareness in different arenas.

Cyber Warfare and Web Espionage

21. One field, in which awareness is, at best, nebulous, is Cyber Warfare. The annual Virtual Criminology Report of 2007, authored by McAfee, warned that international cyber espionage was set to be the biggest single threat to national security in 2008. It claimed that some 120 plus countries are already on the web espionage bandwagon. Primary targets include critical national infrastructure network systems with electricity, air traffic control, financial markets and Government computer networks taking centre-stage. Reports suggest that the USA, Russia and China have acquired considerable capability in this domain. The Indian Armed Forces are increasingly investing in networked operations, both singly and a joint fashion. We cannot, therefore, afford to be vulnerable to cyber attacks. Information Technology is our country's known strength and it would be in our interest to leverage this strength in developing a formidable 'offensive' and 'defensive' cyber warfare capability. Harnessing the gene pool available in academia, private industry and the younger generation of talented individuals is imperative.

Integration & Jointness

22. Let me now address the important issue of Jointness and Integration. It has been said that "War is a continuation of policy by other means". That was in an age when the military was used exclusively to wage war. Today, the scope of activity of the Indian Armed Forces spans a wide bandwidth. It ranges from internal security tasks, augmenting diplomatic effort, bilateral and multi-lateral cooperative efforts with other countries, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief and go on to cover the entire range of tasks across the full spectrum of conflict. The armed forces are instruments of policy execution as much in peace as in war. The need for greater integration of the Armed Forces with the Ministries of Defence, and External Affairs, as well as establishment of effective coordination mechanisms with several other ministries and agencies, is therefore incontestable. If this is not recognised and organisational correctives are not instituted, we will not be able to effectively deal with the various security challenges that confront us - and indulge in futile post-facto blame games.

23. Amongst the Services, as we develop leaders, organisations, systems and doctrines, we must continue to strengthen trust and confidence amongst the Services and between Service components that are committed to joint operations. Let me also state quite unequivocally that migration from a single Service mindset to a 'Joint' one, essentially calls for enlightenment, borne out of a willingness to transform, and a realistic assessment of our operational needs. To this end, the Armed Forces and think tanks such as NMF, CENJOWS, CLAWS, CAPS, USI and IDSA have been conducting seminars and round-tables, the last being the NMF-CENJOWS Seminar on 'Jointness' held just last month. However, a consensus view is yet to emerge on 'where and how to move on' from 'where we are'.

24. The Strategic Forces Command is a good example of how the Services can work together seamlessly and synergistically, in a 'Functional' Command. The ANC was an experiment which was meant to have been a test case for possible future initiatives towards the creation of joint 'Theatre' or 'Geographical' commands. There are strong and divergent opinions about whether this experiment has really succeeded to the degree envisaged in 2001. I think we now have adequate experience to undertake a dispassionate assessment, with the aim of administering course corrections as may be necessary.

25. I believe that 'Functional' Commands are more likely to succeed in our environment – if SFC has worked, how about a Joint Information Warfare Command or a Joint Air Defence Command? At the staff and planning levels, jointness is sought to be achieved through joint capability development, joint planning, joint targetting, joint training, joint logistics and other functions that lend themselves to 'jointness'. During the recently concluded Unified Commanders' Conference, the Chief of the Air Staff opined that "Jointness does not necessarily imply equal partnership" and that there was a need to "adopt correct combinations, whilst respecting the core expertise of individual Services". This is a widely held view and deserves serious consideration.

26. There is also a need to move beyond the present setup of our higher defence management. We must start thinking in terms of command and control structures and linkages, when we have the CDS in place. However, as we work towards creation of more joint commands, we must continue to critically examine the existing joint command for operational effectiveness, make amends and then only move on. We have to generate an India-specific model since blindly aping an existing model elsewhere would be akin to forcing a 'square peg into a round hole'. Each individual Service will, quite understandably, continue to have strong views on the subject but if true jointness has to be ushered in, with a well-deliberated India-specific model, there is a need to foster much greater understanding of the subject amongst our apex level decision makers and perhaps even work towards enacting our own version of a 'Goldwater-Nichols' Act (which, as you are aware, was the guiding legislation for the US Armed Forces to go 'Joint').

27. Integration and jointness are as much required between the Service Headquarters and MoD, as amongst the Services. This is a transformational change and I believe that greater delegation of powers and cross postings of senior officers are steps that must be taken, without which this transformational progress cannot be realised.

Nuclear Issues

28. Just a brief mention of nuclear issues... Speaking at the launch of our first indigenously designed and built nuclear-powered submarine 'Arihant' on 26 Jul 2008, our Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh said: -

"We do not have any aggressive designs nor do we seek to threaten anyone. We seek an external environment in our region and beyond, that is conducive to our peaceful development and the protection of our value systems. Nevertheless it is incumbent upon us to take all measures necessary to safeguard our country and to keep pace with technological advancements worldwide. It has rightly been said that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

29. We have had a well-thought out nuclear policy from the 1980s. India is committed to building a capability that will serve her interests and despite several attempts to 'isolate' us in the field of nuclear technology, especially post-1998, we have walked the path alone and created a capability that is recognised today, albeit grudgingly. We have a draft nuclear doctrine in place, which is restrained, in keeping with our traditional national culture. Our efforts at achieving credible deterrence are not just about weapons and platforms but also include well-thought out strategies, policies, targetting plans, command and control structures as well as an occasional demonstration of capability.

30. Our increasing forays in the nuclear field, both military and civilian, would require the highest assurances of nuclear surety and security within the country. This calls for substantial investments in safety and security procedures, testing of environmental parameters, accident prevention and disaster control as well as management. It also requires a very high degree of awareness and public transparency in proving that our nuclear assets and establishments do not pose a hazard in any way to the population at large.

Reducing 'Defence' Dependence on Foreign Countries

31. Let me now make a brief mention of the critical aspect of self-reliance in the field of defence. Our past experiences of sourcing military hardware from abroad have been varied, depending on the relationship between the source nation and India at different points in time. However, the common strain running through each and every experience has been painfully, one of 'technology denial' and 'post-procurement dependency'. Our material preparedness has often received setbacks due to these reasons. The only long-term solution to this problem is a much greater thrust towards indigenisation and transfer of technology. The Indian defence industry is gradually coming of age and we must, in due course of time, wean ourselves away from foreign dependencies.

Measures to enhance the efficiency of our DPSUs as well as putting much greater premium on time and cost consciousness amongst all agencies concerned are long overdue. There is also a need for greater accountability from our research organisations and defence public sector undertakings, which today rest assured of orders and modernisation funding from the military establishment without having commensurate results to show. The Hon'ble Raksha Mantri has initiated some long overdue in-house reviews of our procurement procedures, aimed at enhancing the efficiency of the processes involved. Whilst the 'bottom line' of 'operational readiness' should remain the determining factor for our 'Buy' or 'Make' decisions, we would need to pragmatically consider some present-day compromise for a more secure future.

Defence Outlay

32. I will now address some more routine and mundane issues but ones that have serious implications on defence preparedness and hence, national security. With regard to defence spending, India will most likely, continue to maintain a high growth rate of between 7 and 8 % over the medium term. A vibrant economic environment will need to be supported by strong defence forces. It is in this context that I have to observe, that for many years, our defence budget as a percentage of GDP, has been hovering on the fringes of the 2% mark, notwithstanding an increase in rupee terms. Let alone bridging the gap between us and our potential adversaries, without a substantial increase, the gap may widen further and dilute our operational edges. It must never be forgotten that India's growth as a military power is an essential component of its ascendancy to 'great power' status and the security underpinning of economic development can never be over-emphasised.

Procurement Procedures

33. While the Armed Forces have been seeking enhanced outlays, you would also be aware that we are unable to completely expend our capital budget, year after year. The problem is not of inadequate planning or insufficient desire to enhance capabilities, but one of procedure. Our procedures discourage participation by international and private players, who run out of patience with our protracted dealings. Measures to make the process more responsive and faster include closer integration of Service HQs with the MoD, simplification of financial vetting procedures, downward delegation of powers for capital procurements, increasing the capacity of concerned bodies to process cases; and a much greater realisation of the adverse implications of delayed decisions on national security. In short - 'Pragmatism' must prevail over 'Procedure'.

The Culture of Strategic Thinking

34. I will now return to two somewhat larger issues. Firstly, a word about the intellectual framework to support our National Security Planning. Any coherent National Security Strategy is the outcome of a long-term vision. Envisioning any long-term perspective calls for a deep and involved thought process. In other words, a culture of strategic thinking. John F Kennedy had once remarked: -

“Too often... we enjoy the comfort of opinion without the discomfort of thought”

Strategic decision-making cannot be guided by 'opinion' but by serious 'thought' – but the reverse is sometimes true. It is unfortunate that discussions on National Security in our country have been left largely to think-tanks and academics, and whilst they may do some valuable work in this direction, they lack the executive powers to put thought into action. For a country of our size and stature, institutionalised strategic thinking mechanism within and outside government is woefully inadequate.

35. In several established democracies, specialist think-tanks have access to government information on a graded basis. They are often given contracts for studies to be done for the government departments. In India, we often, jealously guard information, even if it may be required by other government agencies in the execution of their legitimate official duties. Our media too, barring honourable exceptions, has very few people who specialise in defence, though of late a welcome start has been made.

We have to develop much greater mutual interaction between think-tanks, the government, its agencies and the media. In a democracy, media must be critical – it is intrinsic to the profession – but not needlessly adversarial, which is often the case in our country. Actually, I was tempted to include some light-hearted humour during my talk this evening - but considering some media experiences that I have had in the recent past, I decided to resist that temptation.

36. In the same breath, let me add that I have the greatest respect for the Indian media and its vibrancy – but I would urge some self-introspection in this matter.

Concurrently, there is a need to sustain greater Track II interactions involving the civil society and the private sector as well in our efforts to bring about greater awareness on critical national security issues – and I am happy to note that some commendable initiatives have been taken by the CII and FICCI among some other institutions.

Governance

37. And finally, a brief remark about the all-important aspect of ‘governance’.

Speaking to IAS probationers in April this year, our Prime Minister remarked that: - “Governance is a buzz word today. There are many areas where governance is not keeping in contact with the requirements of the situation.”

38. It is indisputable that no amount of discussion will translate automatically into result-oriented policy and firm action – with the existing lacunae that the Hon’ble Prime Minister referred to. Politicians, bureaucrats, security forces, industry, academia, media and indeed, any other organ of the state or agency involved in the management of national security must work in close coordination and where necessary, integrate, so that they complement each other’s efforts. The need for reforms in several sectors is indeed being recognised, and these must be implemented without delay. Governance obviously needs to focus on securing our national interests and addressing our peoples’ needs and aspirations. The Armed Forces must be an integral part of the ‘decision making’ process on issues of national security that involve them, directly or indirectly.

On their part, the Army, Navy and Air Force, individually and jointly need to contribute in every way that they can, so that the readiness of the Armed Forces and their employment in war and peace can be optimised.

Epilogue

39. Let me once again say how gratified I am, to be in your midst today. My thanks once again to the National Maritime Foundation for providing me this opportunity to speak to such a distinguished audience, in what is perhaps my last major public interaction on National Security before I demit office at the end of this month. Some of you in the audience, as the next generation of leaders of the Armed Forces and major stakeholders in the security of the nation, will need to find ways to bring about much greater integration of thought and action to meet the various challenges that loom large over the horizon.

40. It is indeed a matter of great satisfaction to note that the three Services and the HQIDS have think-tanks of their own and their activities too are 'deepening' and 'widening' by the day. There is a need for these organisations to synergise their efforts with bodies such as the India Habitat Centre and others, in a combined effort to raise the level of consciousness on matters relating to National Security – and here again, the role of the media is critical as an 'awareness multiplier'.

41. Thank you for being a very patient audience.

46-A. Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor to mark the 60th anniversary of the Four Geneva Conventions of 1949.

New Delhi, August 12, 2009.

Mr. Francois Stamm, Head of Regional Delegation, ICRC, New Delhi

Shri Mahesh Bhatt, Eminent Film Personality, who delivered the kind of speech we all like to hear but Ministers can never deliver,

Mr. Arthur Mattli, Charge d'Affaires, Embassy of Switzerland

Dr S P Agarwal, Secretary General, Indian Red Cross Society

Mr. Azmat Ulla, Head of the Regional Delegation, International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, New Delhi

Distinguished participants,

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, Friends

"Even wars have limits". These four words sum up the Four Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, whose 60th Anniversary we are gathered here to celebrate. Not a retirement age, Francois, what we in India call Shastyabdapurti - a landmark 60th birthday.

For millions of people around the world, the rules enshrined in these Conventions have meant, improved detention conditions, fewer indiscriminate attacks against civilians and the availability of medical care for those affected by armed conflict over the past 60 years.

While war itself is inhuman, the Geneva Conventions have offered hope for persons under occupation, captured on the battlefield, shipwrecked at sea or being transported to receive medical care during some of the most difficult times - during armed conflict.

But rules placing limits on behaviour in war have their origins well before 1949. and the human instinct to provide succour to victims is as old as humanity.

The first laws of war were proclaimed by major civilizations several millennia before our era. Many ancient texts including Chinese warrior codes, the Mahabharata, the Bible and the Koran contain rules advocating respect for those no longer taking part in hostilities and for fellow warriors.

For instance, in the Code of Manu, which we may have our differences with on feminist grounds, but which has many enlightened injunctions we find the following prohibitions: "when he fights with his foes in battle, let him not strike with weapons concealed (in wood), nor with (such as are) barbed, poisoned, or the points of which are blazing with fire." (All techniques that had been used:- warfare up to that point.) Similarly, a branch of Buddhism includes the Vimalakirti Sutra, which contains the following verse, "In times of war, give rise in yourself to the mind of compassion..."

Since you are publishing a Hindi edition of "A memory of Sohana", let me mention that we also have an early Indian example of a "Henri Dunant". After the battle of Anandpur in 1704 between the Mughal army and the Sikhs, Bhai Kanhaiya, went around the battlefield serving water to and tending the wounded from both sides.

The codification of international humanitarian law (IHL, or the law of armed conflict) in treaty form, was sparked by the events of another anniversary this year, that of the 150 years since Henry Dunant, a 31-year old Swiss businessman, (and it is striking how young he was when he changed the world), witnessed the aftermath of a bloody battle in Solferino (Italy), between the armies of imperial Austria and the Franco-Sardinian alliance. Around 40,000 men lay dead or wounded on the battlefield. The wounded lacked medical attention and so he organised local people to attend to the soldiers' wounds and to feed and comfort them. On his return to Geneva he called for the creation of national relief societies to assist those wounded in war, and sowed the seed for the future Geneva Conventions.

The as we have been reminded today, the Red Cross was born in 1863 when five men, including Henry Dunant, set up the International Committee for Relief to the Wounded, later to become the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). In 1864, 12 governments adopted the first Geneva Convention, a milestone in the history of IHL, offering care to the wounded and sick on the battlefield.

This was followed by important developments in 1907 (protection of combatants wounded at sea), and in 1929 (protection of prisoners of war). On August 12, 1949 the Four Geneva Conventions were adopted, which included updates of the previous three Conventions and a new Fourth Convention protecting civilians. We also therefore celebrate today the international community's decision 60 years ago to establish new rules on how civilians should be treated in armed conflict, as well as rules governing non-international armed conflict. In 1977 two more protocols were added and another in 2005. Without them our understanding of international law today would be very different.

The Fourth Convention in particular was one of the international community's key responses to the horrors witnessed during the Second World War. Each of the Four Conventions is directed toward the protection of different classes of the victims of war, namely, the wounded and sick in armed forces in the field; the wounded, sick and shipwrecked among armed forces at sea; prisoners of war; and civilians.

The International Committee of the Red Cross has been instrumental in drafting the Geneva Conventions and in pushing for greater respect of these rules in armed conflict. The path Henry Dunant started led us to the Four Geneva Conventions of 1949, which, for the first time in history, constitute treaties now acceded to by the entire world's treaty-signing States - in other words, they are truly universal.

When the Geneva Conventions were adopted, conflicts were more likely to take place between States. However, the last 60 years have witnessed more non-international armed conflicts than international armed conflicts, while fewer rules regulate internal armed conflict. "Common Article 3" therefore, has been invoked by the ICRC as often as any other provision of the 1949 Geneva Conventions. Access by humanitarian organisations, including but not limited to, the ICRC, to conflict areas, remains an essential element in seeking to alleviate the suffering caused by armed conflicts.

Since the 1864 Geneva Convention was open for signature, the Swiss Government has played the important role of depositary of the Conventions, and I am pleased to see their participation at this event. India was the fifth State in the world to deposit its instrument of ratification of the 1949 Conventions with the Swiss Federal Council, doing so after only Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Monaco and Chile. We are also the first country in the region to adopt specific implementing legislation for the 1949 Conventions, through the 1960 Geneva Conventions Act.

The Red Cross movement also has a long history in India. During the First World War, in 1914, there was no organization in India for relief services to the affected soldiers, except a branch of the St. John Ambulance Association and a Joint Committee of the British Red Cross. (It was for St. John's that Mahatma Gandhi organized ambulances in South India.) A bill to constitute the Indian Red Cross Society, Independent of the British Red Cross, was adopted in March 1920, and The Indian Red Cross Society (IRCS) is a member of the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement. It partners with other national Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, along with the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement (IFRC), and the ICRC.

The relevance of IHL in the present day international situation remains high. The nature of conflicts has changed over time. Unfortunately, the South Asian region is not an exception. We have witnessed conflicts in many different forms, including what is commonly referred to as 'terrorism'. While the Geneva Conventions in particular and IHL in general do not provide a universal definition of terrorism, they explicitly prohibit most acts committed against civilians and civilian objects in armed conflict that would commonly be considered "terrorist" if committed in peacetime. Terrorism violates one of the most important tenets of IHL, the principle of distinction. Indeed, acts of violence directed against civilians or civilian objects in armed conflict constitute war crimes, or "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions.

Therefore, it is imperative for all of us to underline the significance of IHL. It is true that the lasting solution to conflicts would be possible not through mere legal reform but through certain substantive changes, which also include political and economic reforms. However, regulatory systems such as international humanitarian law mitigate suffering in situations of armed conflict, thus creating a conducive environment for establishing lasting peace. I believe that legal frameworks such as IHL are of enormous significance in shielding the victims of armed conflict from the worst effects of war. As one who had spent a large portion of my own professional life at the UN and laterally, though briefly, at the ICRC, I would like to stress that we therefore strive to ensure that the rules codified 60 years ago are respected in practice.

Thank you very much.

047. Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor: 'Why Foreign Policy Matters' at St. Stephens College of the Delhi University and Aligarh Muslim University.

Delhi, August 13 and Aligarh, August 19, 2009.

It is indeed a privilege to be addressing you on the subject of "Why Foreign Policy Matters", and particularly to do so just a few days after our celebrations of the 62nd anniversary of our Independence. At that midnight hour when, in Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru's memorable words, India awoke to life and freedom, our country was deeply conscious of its international obligations. In his historic speech about India's "tryst with destiny", Nehruji, speaking of his country's dreams, said: "Those dreams are for India, but they are also for the world, for all the nations and peoples are too closely knit together today for any one of them to imagine that it can live apart. Peace has been said to be indivisible; so is freedom, so is prosperity now, and so also is disaster in this One World that can no longer be split into isolated fragments." These words are typical of that great nationalist that a time when the fires of Partition were blazing across the land, he thought not only of India, but of the world. In recalling that spirit 62 years later, I am pleased to see so many internationalist-minded young Indians here today.

In those six decades, the world has become even more closely knit together than Nehruji foresaw. Indeed, today I think it is fair to say that even those countries that once felt insulated from external dangers -- by wealth or strength or distance -- now fully realize that the safety of people everywhere depends not only on local security forces, but also on guarding against terrorism; warding off the global spread of pollution, of diseases, of illegal drugs and of weapons of mass destruction; and on promoting human rights, democracy and development.

Jobs everywhere, too, depend not only on local firms and factories, but on faraway markets for products and services, on licenses and access from foreign governments, on an international environment that allows the free movement of goods, services, and persons, and on international institutions that ensure stability - in short, on the international system that sustains our globalized world.

Today, whether you are a resident of Delhi or Dili, Durban or Darwin, Aligarh or Alabama - whether you are from Noida or New York- it is simply not realistic to think only in terms of your own country. Global forces press in from every conceivable direction. People, goods and ideas cross borders and cover vast distances with ever greater frequency, speed and ease. We are increasingly connected through travel, trade, the Internet; what we watch, what we eat and even the games we play.

These benign forces are matched by more malign ones that are equally global. When I was only a few years older than most of you, I began my United Nations career dealing with people without passports, refugees caught in the conflict in Vietnam and Cambodia. In my later career, I learned that these people personified what the United Nations was increasingly called upon to deal with, "problems without passports" - problems that cross all frontiers uninvited, problems of terrorism, the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, of the degradation of our common environment, of contagious disease and chronic starvation, of human rights and human wrongs, of mass illiteracy and massive displacement. Such problems also require solutions that cross all frontiers, since no one country or group of countries can solve them alone.

Let us not forget that 9/11 made clear the old cliché about our global village - for it showed that a fire that starts in a remote thatched hut or dusty tent in one corner of that village can melt the steel girders of the tallest skyscrapers at the other end of our global village.

In such a world, issues that once seemed very far away are very much in your backyard. What happens in North America or North Africa - from protectionist politics to deforestation and desertification to the fight against AIDS - can affect your lives wherever you live, even here in North India. And your choices here - what you buy, how you vote - can resound far away. As someone once said about water pollution, we all live downstream. We are all interconnected, and we can no longer afford the luxury of not thinking about the rest of the planet in anything we do.

Our choice is clear: we must be globally active if we are to create and maintain the society we want at home. And our success at home is the best guarantee that we will be respected and effective abroad.

After all, your own lives reflect a variety of global experiences. What does it mean to be a young person in Delhi or Aligarh today? It can mean waking up to an alarm clock made in China, downing a cup of tea from leaves first planted by the British, donning jeans designed in America and taking a Japanese scooter or a Korean car to get to an Indian college, where your textbooks might be printed with German-invented technology on paper first pulped in Sweden. You might call your friends on a Finnish mobile phone to invite them to an Italian pizza or even what you think of as desi khana, featuring naan that came here from Persia, tandoori chicken taught to us by rulers from Uzbekistan and aloo and hari mirch that first came to India only 400 years ago from Latin America. And the most desi thing of all, of course, is suspicion of anything foreign.

Suspicion of things foreign has hardly been absent from our own country's political experience. In India, self-reliance and economic self-sufficiency were a mantra for more than four decades after independence, and there were real doubts as to whether the country should open itself further to the world economy. Whereas in most of the West, most people axiomatically associate capitalism with freedom, India's nationalists associated capitalism with slavery. Why? Because the British East India Company came to trade and stayed on to rule. So India's nationalist leaders were suspicious of every foreigner with a briefcase, seeing him as the thin edge of a neo-imperial wedge. Instead of integrating India into the global capitalist system, as only a handful of post-colonial countries like Singapore chose to do, India's leaders (and those of most of the former colonies) were convinced that the political independence they had fought for so hard and long could only be guaranteed through economic independence. So self-reliance became the slogan, the protectionist barriers went up, and India spent 45 years with bureaucrats rather than businessmen on the "commanding heights" of the economy, often, despite the best of intentions, subsidizing unproductivity, regulating stagnation and effectively, if unwittingly, distributing not wealth but poverty. (Which only goes to prove that one of the lessons you learn from history is that history sometimes teaches the wrong lessons.)

It was only after a world-class financial crisis in 1991, when our Government had to physically ship its reserves of gold to London to stand collateral for an IMF loan, failing which we might have defaulted on our debt, that India liberalized its economy under our then Finance Minister Manmohan Singh. Since then we have become a poster-child for globalization. Our growth and prosperity would be impossible without the rest of the world.

To the young people here, let me say that you are likely to spend a lot of your adult lives interacting with people who don't look, sound, dress or eat like you; that you might work for an internationally-oriented company with clients, colleagues or investors from around the globe; and that you are likely to take your holidays in far-flung destinations. The world into which you will grow will be full of such opportunities. But along with such opportunities, you may also find yourself vulnerable to threats from beyond our borders: terrorism, of course, but also transnational crime syndicates, counterfeiters of currency, drug smugglers, child traffickers, internet spammers, credit-card crooks and even imported illnesses like swine flu.

Wouldn't you want your government to devise policies to deal with such challenges that would affect your, and one day your children's, lives? Should such policies, in an ever more interdependent world, even be called foreign? One of the reasons that foreign policy matters today is that foreign policy is no longer merely foreign: it affects you right here where you live. You want your government to seize the opportunities that the 21st century world provides, while managing the risks and protecting you from the threats that this world has also opened you up to.

Indians therefore have a growing stake in international developments. To put it another way, the food we grow and we eat, the air we breathe, and our health, security, prosperity and quality of life are increasingly affected by what happens beyond our borders. And that means we can simply no longer afford to be indifferent about our neighbours, however distant they may appear. Ignorance is not a shield; it is not even, any longer, an excuse. Knowledge of others, on the other hand, brings great advantages in today's world.

At the same time, much of what we are in the process of accomplishing at home - to pull our people out of poverty and to develop our nation -- enables us to contribute to a better world. This is of value in itself, and it is also in our fundamental national interest. A world that is peaceful and prosperous, where trade is freer and universally-agreed principles are observed, and in which democracy, the co-existence of civilizations and respect for human rights flourish, is a world of opportunity for India and for Indians to thrive.

If this century has, in the famous phrase, made the world safe for democracy, the next challenge is to make a world safe for diversity. It is in India's interest to ensure that the world as a whole must reflect the idea that is already familiar to all Indians - that it shouldn't matter what the colour of your skin is, the kind of food you eat, the sounds you make when you speak, the God you choose to worship (or not), so long as you want to play by the same rules as everybody else, and dream the same dreams. It is not essential in a democratic world to agree all the time, as long as we agree on the ground rules of how we will disagree. These are the global principles we must strive to uphold if we are to be able to continue to uphold them securely at home.

Because the distinction between domestic and international is less and less meaningful in today's world, when we think of foreign policy we must also think of its domestic implications. The ultimate purpose of any country's foreign policy is to promote the security and well-being of its own citizens. We want a world that gives us the conditions of peace and security that will permit us to grow and flourish, safe from foreign depredations but open to external opportunities.

At the same time there is a consensus in our country that India should seek to continue to contribute to international security and prosperity, to a well-ordered and equitable world, and to democratic, sustainable development for all.

This we will continue to do, and we will do so in an environment in which change is the only constant. If I may be permitted the indulgence of a personal reminiscence, let me tell you how much my old organization, the UN, has been transformed in the career span of this one former UN official speaking to you. If I had even suggested to my seniors when I joined the Organization in 1978 that the UN would one day observe and even run elections in sovereign states, conduct intrusive inspections for weapons of mass destruction, impose comprehensive sanctions on the entire import-export trade of a Member State, create a counter-terrorism committee to monitor national actions against terrorists, or set up international criminal tribunals and coerce governments into handing over their citizens to be tried by foreigners under international law, I am sure they would have told me that I simply did not understand what the United Nations was all about. (And indeed, since that was in the late 1970s, they might well have asked me - "Young man, what have you been smoking?")

And yet the UN has done every one of those things during the last two decades, and more. It is a reflection of how much the world around has evolved since the era when the Cold War seemed frozen in place, borders seemed immutable, and the Soviet Union looked as if it would last for ever. If all of those things could change so dramatically within one generation, shouldn't we be better prepared, as a country and a society, for similar changes to happen in the lifetime of your generation?

Indeed, the institutions of global governance have been expanding beyond the UN itself. There are selective inter-governmental mechanisms like the G-8, military alliances like NATO, sub-regional groupings like the Economic Community of West African States, one-issue alliances like the Nuclear Suppliers Group. Writers connect under International PEN, soccer players in FIFA, athletes under the International Olympic Committee, mayors in the World Organization of United Cities and Local Governments. Bankers listen to the Bank of International Settlements and businessmen to the International Accounting Standards Board. The process of regulating human activity above and beyond national boundaries has never been more widespread.

To these elements of international co-operation we must add a veritable alphabet soup of new bodies and new arrangements for multilateral engagement. India alone belongs to IBSA, to BRIC, to SAARC and the East Asian Summit; it is a member of the G-20 and the ARF; it observes the meetings of the SCO and attends the G-8. It pursues its interests in organizations as universal and well-known as the UN and as small and obscure as IOR-ARC.

It's not just multilateral organizations we should think about: the world has changed in other ways too. Today, the smartest executive jets are made by Embraer of Brazil; the tallest building in the world is currently in Dubai, an incomplete structure that has just overtaken the previous tallest building, in Taipei; the world's biggest plane is being built in Russia and Ukraine; the world's largest Ferris wheel is in Singapore; the biggest shopping mall is in Beijing; and the country with the largest number of nationals in the Forbes list of the world's ten richest people is India, with four billionaires whose combined assets, once valued at $180 billion, exceed those of the majority of the member states of the United Nations. Thirty years ago, all these categories would have been headed by the United States. The US remains the world's sole superpower, but others are catching up fast in various areas where it had alone been dominant.

This is the world to which India must learn to adapt. It was Mahatma Gandhi who famously said, "You must be the change you wish to see in the world." That applies to India too. We seek to redefine our place in a world that has changed from the geopolitical realities of 1945 which shaped the current international system, including the permanent membership of the Security Council. We are today one of the world's largest economies, a proud player on the global stage with a long record of responsible conduct on international matters. But is our foreign policy apparatus commensurate with the challenge? Is our society as a whole imbued with a consciousness of the strategic opportunity that engagement with the globe offers? Can we be taken seriously as a potential world leader in the 21st century if we do not develop the institutions, the practices, the personnel and the mindset required to lead in the global arena?

Our foreign policy debates in Parliament and the media seem obsessed with Pakistan or with ephemera, or worse, ephemera about Pakistan. There is little appetite for an in-depth discussion about, say, the merits of participating in the Non-Aligned Movement or the Conference of Democracies, or the importance we should give to such bodies as SAARC or the Indian Ocean Rim Conference. As Minister of State for External Affairs I suppose I should be grateful, even relieved, at being allowed to get on with foreign policy making without the interference of the general public. But in my view foreign policy is too important an issue to be left to the Ministry of External Affairs alone. Our society as a whole, and particularly its educated young people, must care enough about India's place in the world to participate actively in shaping our international posture.

And yet the picture around us is a pretty dismal one. International relations is a neglected subject on our campuses; I have deliberately chosen to speak on this topic at a college/university, which does not offer a course of study in international relations. The few colleges that do offer the subject do so in a formalistic and formulaic fashion that ill-equip the student to understand the realities of our contemporary world. JNU apart, few can hold a candle to the universities in China, Russia or the West that teach international relations to young people of a similar age to the majority of you.

We do have a handful of thinkers on international issues and a fistful of think-tanks, but in quantum and quality of expertise and range of output they all have a long way to go before they match the role played by, for example, their equivalents in the United States.

And what about the young people so well represented here today, who must shape the future orientation of India to the world? A young Indian scholar, Raja Karthikeya Gundu, recently wrote: "Few Indian students go beyond the West for study, and even if they wanted to, there are barely any scholarships or resources from government or private sector to do so. The average Indian has barely any understanding of foreign cultures, norms and worldviews, and satellite TV and Internet have not managed to change this. Hence, in the absence of global exposure, Indians continue to be an inward-looking nation burdened by prejudice. Thus, it is no surprise that when Indians travel abroad for the first time in their mature years, they are often culturally inadaptably and even mildly xenophobic." This strikes me as somewhat overstated, and yet there is a kernel of truth in it.

The situation will not improve unless we improve the study of international affairs at our colleges and universities. Last year I was invited by my Singaporean friend Kishore Mahbubani to join a gathering organized by his Lee Kuan Yew School of Public Policy, of some of the most eminent scholars of International Relations to brainstorm on improving the current state of the discipline in India. I couldn't join his effort but one scholar who did, Amitabh Mattoo, observed that "There are few other disciplines in India... where the gulf between the potential and the reality is as wide as it is in the teaching and research of IR at Indian universities. Interest in India and India's interest in the world are arguably at their highest in modern times, and yet Indian scholarship on global issues is showing few signs of responding to this challenge."

Today, IR is taught in more than 100 universities in India, but in Mattoo's words, "most of the IR departments have a shortage of qualified faculty, poor infrastructure, outdated curriculum and few research opportunities". More than half the departments do not even have access to the internet, and are deprived of the rich wealth of online resources that students elsewhere in the world can command. Books and journals are in short supply. Little expertise has been developed in specific areas or countries of concern to India; to take one example, despite all the fuss about the reference to Balochistan in the recent joint statement at Sharm-el Shaikh, there is no major scholar of Baloch studies in India to whom either the MEA or its critics can turn. Foreign languages are poorly taught, resources for study trips abroad are scarce, and research is of varying quality and opportunities for cross-fertilization at academic conferences practically non-existent. Whereas China, a latecomer to the field, has already developed, in the last three decades, a critical mass of students and scholars of IR, we are behind where we were in the heady days of the Nehruvian 1950s when we established bodies like Sapru House and the Indian Council of World Affairs which we have allowed to atrophy.

My friend Kanti Bajpai has argued that "Rising powers seem to get the IR" they need. But it won't just happen. We need to change the way we all think about international relations ;V you, the future leaders of this country, and we, its present ones. The MEA is willing to play its part, in collaboration with those responsible for educational policy, to bring about the change I have been calling for.

To return to Amitabh Mattoo, he warns "India's inability to develop a sophisticated and comprehensive understanding of the world outside will have more serious consequences than just the dwarfing of a discipline. It could well stunt India's ability to influence the international system." That is an outcome that, for all the reasons I have described, we can ill afford.

Mahatma Gandhi's point about "being the change" applies to my Ministry too. Even though my experience of it from within is relatively new, I do believe there are some changes we ourselves can bring about and which I will be advocating in the months ahead. Some specific examples:

- As I said earlier, I believe foreign policy is much too important an issue to be left to the Foreign Ministry alone. Discussion of international relations should not be confined to the seminar rooms in Delhi, and that is why I was delighted on 11th August 2009 to lead a seminar on Indo-Arab relations in Cochin. All Indians, even 2000 kilometers away from the nation's capital, have a vital stake in the development of our foreign policy. I would welcome much more spirited exchanges between MEA officials and academia, the corporate sector and civil society, in person, through regular meetings and even email, respecting confidentiality but not fighting shy of ideas or opinion that challenges our entrenched mindsets.
- Foreign language assignments to IFS officers. I have been struck by how often I have come across Chinese speakers in our consulates in Germany or Anglophone diplomats in France. Surely we can aim at a time when every national language is spoken by at least one Indian officer and an eventual time when every one of our missions is headed by an Ambassador who knows the language, be it Khmer or Korean, Spanish or Swahili.
- I have written elsewhere of the need to develop and exploit India's considerable "soft power", by making this integral to the work of our territorial divisions, rather than leaving it solely to umbrella entities like ICCR and the Public Diplomacy Division. This will mean taking Indian literature, culture, music and dance abroad as an adjunct to Indian diplomacy, and doing so within a context of a coherent public diplomacy strategy that weaves together many institutions that currently function separately.
- Recently, we have seen the stirrings of a purposeful debate on whether the IFS exam should be distinct and separate from others in the UPSC. During my days in college, pretty much everyone aimed at the Foreign Service, and the Foreign Service drew exclusively from the top ten finishers in the national competitive examinations. Today, as working abroad for the government has lost some of its allure, this is no longer the case; indeed, for many applicants the IFS is a third or even fourth preference amongst the career options available to those who do well in the exams. I feel strongly that a diplomat should not be someone who fell short of his or her real goal of being an administrator, revenue official or police officer. We need internationalist-minded young Indians who see the chance of serving the country abroad not only as a privilege but as something indispensable to India's growth and prosperity.

The tragedy of 26/11 confirmed yet again how much greater coordination we need among the many programmes and players in government involved with security and other international issues, and how essential is the modernization of our domestic and international instruments to keep Indians safe. We will have to work harder in government, and with Indians of all walks of life – including business groups interested in foreign markets and in international investors -- to ensure that we break down the “narrow domestic walls” that Tagore wrote about and promote a coherent, visible Indian approach to the world, backed with sufficient resources to take action and to get our messages across clearly. This will help to ensure that India remains influential on issues of concern in an increasingly competitive world.

In other words, the sustainability and success of our international policy depends on both leadership by the Government of India and the active involvement of young Indians. The Government is committed to protecting and advancing the global citizenship of all of you, but it cannot be done without your strong involvement.

The world, I am convinced, is going your way. You are a new, globalized, impatient generation of Indians who rightly refuse to be confined to the limited worldviews of older generations. The horizons of your world are ever widening. The prospects for international engagement, for more widespread prosperity, for more borderless success, have never been brighter. But the world needs your commitment, too.

I call upon you all today to commit yourself to thinking about India and the world - about India in the world - and your own role in learning about it, helping to shape it, and one day, I hope, helping to lead it.

Thank you.

048. Extracts from the speech of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh delivered from the Red Fort on the occasion of the Independence Day.

Delhi, August 15, 2009.

I consider myself fortunate to once again have the opportunity to address you on this sacred day of 15th August. On this auspicious occasion, I extend my hearty greetings to all of you.

Today is most certainly a day of happiness and pride for us. We are proud of our freedom. We are proud of our democracy. We are proud of our values and ideals. But we should also remember that it has taken the sacrifices of lakhs of Indians to bring us where we are today. Our well being and progress have been built upon the foundation of the hard work and sacrifices of our freedom fighters, the brave jawans of our armed forces, our farmers, our workers and our scientists.

Today, we remember all those martyrs who laid down their lives for the freedom and security of our country. The best way of paying homage to those brave sons of our country will be to resolve today that we will always stay committed to strengthening the unity and integrity of our nation. Let us all together take a vow that we will spare no effort to take India to greater heights.

Climate change has become an issue of global concern in recent years. If we don't take the necessary steps in time, our glaciers will melt and our rivers will go dry. The problems of droughts and floods will grow in seriousness. We also need to prevent air pollution. India wishes to tackle the problem of climate change in partnership with other countries of the world. We have taken a decision to constitute 8 National Missions. We are committed to meet the challenge of climate change through these 8 Missions. To increase the use of solar energy and to make it affordable, we will launch the Jawaharlal Nehru National Solar Mission on 14th November of this year.

The sacred Ganga is the life source for crores of Indians. It is our duty to keep the river clean. We have constituted the National Ganga Authority in which the Central and State Governments will jointly work towards this end. The cooperation of the public is also needed in this effort.

Our natural resources are limited. We must use them more efficiently. We need a new culture of energy conservation. We also need to prevent the misuse of water. We will pay more attention to programmes for water collection and storage. "Save Water" should be one of our national slogans.

Today's world is becoming smaller in many respects. Whether it is the international economic crisis or terrorism or climate change - what happens in one part of the world has an effect on other parts also. The international economic and political order is changing. Questions are being raised on the functioning and continued effectiveness of the multilateral institutions established in the 20th Century.

Our foreign policy should be able to cater to India's interests in these constantly changing circumstances. I am happy that we have been successful in doing this to a large extent.

We have good relations with the United States, Russia, China, Japan and Europe. There is a tremendous amount of goodwill for India and its people in the countries of South East Asia, Central Asia, West Asia and the Gulf. We have further strengthened our traditional ties with Africa. We are looking for new opportunities in Latin America.

As far our neighbours are concerned, we want to live with them in peace and harmony. We will make every possible effort to create an environment conducive to the social and economic development of the whole of South Asia.

049. Inaugural Address of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Conference of Chief Ministers of the Indian State on Internal Security.

New Delhi, August 17, 2009.

I am happy to be here with you today and warmly welcome all of you to this important Conference. The importance of this Conference cannot be over-emphasized. The many serious challenges to our internal security call for careful deliberation and sincere action. I hope this Conference will not only be a forum for exchange of ideas but will also result in building a broad-based consensus on what needs to be done in many crucial areas of our internal security.

We had last met in January this year. A number of steps were discussed in that meeting and I am happy that a substantial amount of work has been done in the subsequent period. I congratulate my Cabinet colleague Shri P. Chidambaram for single minded pursuit of the objectives that we had collectively agreed in general. I understand that four regional hubs of the National Security Guard have been established and operationalised at Mumbai, Kolkata, Chennai and Hyderabad. Two Regional Centres of the NSG will shortly be established at Hyderabad and Kolkata. A National Investigative Agency has been established. I request the Chief Ministers to extend all possible cooperation to this Agency to make it a truly effective instrument in our fight against terrorism. Quick Response Teams and Special Intervention Units are being set up at the State level to enhance the speed of response to terrorist attacks. A major effort is being made to improve Intelligence gathering and dissemination both at the Central and State levels. A well-calibrated Coastal Security Scheme is being put in place. But we obviously need to do much more and we shall. The challenges posed by asymmetric warfare and terrorism as also the Left Wing Extremism can only be met through new ideas and more resolute actions and determination. We need to be ahead of the curve if we are to succeed as we must.

Coming to specific challenges, cross-border terrorism remains a most pervasive threat. We have put in place additional measures after the Mumbai terrorist attack in November last year. But there is need for continued vigilance. There is credible information of ongoing plans of terrorist groups in Pakistan to carry out fresh attacks*. The area of operation of these terrorists today extends far beyond the confines of Jammu & Kashmir and covers all parts of our country.

In dealing with the terrorist challenge we need to be prepared for encountering more sophisticated technologies and enhanced capabilities. We also need to guard our sea frontier as vigilantly as our land border.

Left Wing extremism is another serious challenge. Later today the Home Minister will hold a separate meeting on this subject. But I would like to emphasize the growing intensity of the problem. There have been heavy casualties inflicted recently on security forces by Naxalite groups. There are also indications of yet more offensive action by these groups. The problem of Left Wing extremism is indeed a complex one. There is a need for a balanced and nuanced strategy to deal with it. On the one hand the State should discharge its responsibilities and obligations and re-establish the Rule of Law in areas dominated by the Naxalites. At the same time we should work towards removing the causes which lead to alienation of people and problems like Naxalism.

I would like to make a mention of the situation prevailing in Jammu & Kashmir and some of the States in the North-East. The situation in Jammu & Kashmir has, during the past few years, seen substantial improvement. Figures of violence have been steadily declining and are today at an all-time low. But there are some disturbing trends on the horizon. Levels of infiltration which had come down very substantially have seen a surge this year, alongside an increase in attempts at infiltration. The infiltrators appear more battle-hardened, better equipped, and in possession of sophisticated communications.

There are also signs of a revival of over-ground militant activities. Attempts are being made to link isolated and unconnected incidents - such as those which occurred in Shopian, Sopore, Baramulla - to create an impression of a groundswell of anti-national feeling. All this shows that efforts to disturb the current status quo have not been given up. Fortunately, the annual Amarnath Yatra passed off without incident, a tribute to the secular character of the people of J&K.

In the North East there is an overall improvement but the situation in some states particularly in Assam, Manipur and Nagaland remains problematic and worrisome. Assam and Manipur account for a disproportionately large number of violent incidents reported from the North East, with the latter's share being as high as 30%. In Assam, the Centre had sanctioned an amount of Rs. 750 crore for development of Bodo areas. But the utilization of these funds remains unsatisfactory. The resettlement and rehabilitation of those affected by the violence in the Bodo areas and North Cachar Hills is a matter of concern. Manipur is plagued by a large number of militant outfits. The Government of Manipur needs to put in place appropriate mechanisms for increased participation of people in developmental projects.

I would request the Chief Ministers of all the North Eastern States to pay particular attention to the implementation of infrastructure projects. There is also a need in the North East for more emphasis on pro-active State police forces rather than exclusive reliance on the Central Para Military Forces and Army. The resources for policing need to be enhanced substantially. Manipur has increased the number of sanctioned posts at the police station level but a large number of them remain unfilled. All the States in the North East would do well to ensure the representation of all groups and communities in their police forces and carry out recruitment to these forces in a transparent manner.

As far as the communal situation is concerned, we have reasons for satisfaction. In the past five years, no serious communal incidents have occurred. But some States like Maharashtra and Karnataka need to exercise greater vigil to maintain communal peace. Karnataka, in particular, has witnessed a number of communal incidents during this year. What is more worrisome is that the incidents were not limited to one or two districts. Like in other areas of internal security, we must all be on our guard against attempts by communal fanatics to accentuate communal tensions, disturb the peace and weaken the fabric of our inclusive society.

We are all aware that most issues pertaining to internal security require a coordinated response by the Centre and the States acting in concert. The importance of this can not be over-emphasized. A piece meal approach will simply not work given the nature of challenges we face. Not only do we need more information sharing, we also need synchronized action. Let me assure all the States that the Centre will not be found wanting in this regard.

We are committed to assist the States in all possible ways in dealing with the challenges of internal security. We will also do our utmost in facilitating inter-State coordination. I would urge States to take more initiative for coordinating action with other States.

I do recognize that States often face constraints of resources. But ultimately we must all bear the burden of our shared sense of responsibility. It must also be recognized that there are limits to what the Central Government can provide. I hope that the expectations of the States from the Centre would be guided by a consciousness of their own obligations as well as a sense of practical realism.

In conclusion, I look forward to the deliberations of this conference and I sincerely hope they will help to evolve a consensus about a concerted strategy and action programme for meeting the challenges to our internal security. I wish your deliberations all success and I thank you."

* Pakistan Foreign Office reacting to the above statement of Prime Minister said on the same day:

"We have noted the reported comments made by the Prime Minister of India today in which he expressed apprehensions about terrorist attacks being planned in Pakistan against India. The Deputy High Commissioner of India was called to the Foreign Office by Director General ( South Asia ) today. He was conveyed the following:

- Indian Prime Minister's remarks warrant serious and prompt attention.
- The Government of Pakistan would like to extend its fullest cooperation to pre-empt any act of terror.
- Terrorism is a common enemy. Pakistan has itself been a victim of terrorism.
- At Sharm El Sheikh, both sides had agreed that the "two countries will share real time, credible and actionable information on any future terrorist threats."
- In all sincerity, we would request India to share information that they have and for our part we stand ready to cooperate fully in pre-empting any act of terror.
- Terrorism can only be combated by serious, sustained and pragmatic cooperation. We wish to renew our offer of cooperation to India in this regard."

The next day on August 17, the Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs Shashi Tharoor said the Prime Minister's statement was not intended to "impugn the actions of Government of Pakistan." "What the Prime Minister has said is that some terror organisations appear to pose a threat to us. A very real and credible threat. He did not in any way impugn the actions of Government of Pakistan," he said explaining Dr. Singh's remarks. Mr. Tharoor said "we hope the Pakistan government will do everything on their part to prevent any fresh attack on India emerging from its soil." Asked if it was contrary to what was decided in Sharm-El Sheikh where the Prime Ministers of both India and Pakistan signed a joint statement, he said "the Prime Minister at no point attacked the Government of Pakistan... He was not going back on the goodwill he had generated and his fundamental desire for peaceful relations with our neighbours."

050. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on the Interaction of first batch of awardees of Fulbright-Nehru Scholarship with Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao.

New Delhi, August 19, 2009.

The first batch of U.S. Scholars who have been awarded Fulbright-Nehru Scholarships have arrived in India to commence their scholarship/fellowship programmes. Of the 89 U.S. Scholars selected through a 3-stage objective process, the first group of 38 Scholars was received at Ministry of External Affairs on the 17th August.

They were addressed by Foreign Secretary Smt. Nirupama Rao, co-chair of the Board of the US-India Education Foundation, who welcomed them. Recalling the commitment of the Governments of India and the U.S.A to explore the significant potential of bilateral co-operation in Education, Smt. Rao underlined that such linkages between the academic communities of both our knowledge societies would contribute significantly to strengthening the current partnership - and shaping the future relationship - between India and the U.S.A.

A new initiative, the India-U.S. Education Dialogue has been announced by both Governments on the occasion of the visit of the U.S. Secretary of State to India on July 20, 2009.

The scholars shared with Foreign Secretary their respective areas of research and study - subjects as diverse and varied as studies on autism, ground water contamination, social and economic themes in advocating environmental awareness, micro finance and deshbhakti sangeet. The scholars included teachers who will be in India on a nine month exchange programme, teaching at various schools spread over the country.

It may be recalled that the revised and updated version of the Fulbright Agreement was signed between the Governments of India and the U.S.A. on July 4, 2008. 71 Indian scholars have been selected for studies in the U.S. - who were similarly felicitated earlier this year by the USIEF.

051. Salient points of the Inaugural Speech by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna while inaugurating the Conference of Indian Heads of Mission.

New Delhi, August 24, 2009.

[The second Conference of Heads of Indian Missions abroad began today morning at Vigyan Bhawan, in New Delhi.

The conference was formally inaugurated by External Affairs Minister Hon'ble S. M. Krishna. In his address EAM said that 'Development, inclusive economic growth and alleviation of poverty have to be our foremost strategic goals. The main purpose of our foreign policy is to assist in the fulfillment of these goals by providing an enabling external environment which ensures our security, promotes trade, nurtures our key bilateral relationships, safeguards our national interest and enhances our influence in the world. We should never forget that the aspirations of India's people are the bedrock of India's foreign policy'.

EAM noted that the 'challenges before us are many and we have to find ways to manage, contain and eliminate them. There is the challenge of terrorism, and of ensuring that our neighbourhood is stable and peaceful and that our surrounding environment is conducive to the pursuit of our national goal of comprehensive socio-economic development'.

Salient excerpts from EAM's address were:]

'On our immediate neighbourhood' - India is committed to close and good neighbourly relations with all the countries in the Indian subcontinent. We share a special affinity and common destiny with our neighbours. Bhutan is the first country I visited on assuming charge as Foreign Minister and for good reason. India has strongly supported Nepal's transition to a democratic polity. We recognize that the new government faces serious challenges in achieving stability and have been encouraging all political parties to cooperate with the new government in working towards early conclusion of the peace process on the basis of widest possible consensus. The conclusion of the military operations culminating in the defeat of LTTE in Sri Lanka provides it an opportunity for a future free from terrorism and conflict. We have been providing humanitarian assistance to Sri Lanka and hope that the IDPs would be rehabilitated soon. We look forward to the Sri Lankan Government bringing about a lasting political settlement that meets the political aspirations of all communities through effective devolution of power. An encouraging development in our neighbourhood has been the return of Bangladesh to multiparty democratic politics.

‘On Afghanistan’ - Last week we had Presidential elections in Afghanistan against the backdrop of an attempt by the Taliban to raise levels of violence. We have stood firm behind the Government of Afghanistan’s efforts to stabilise the country. This is natural given our age old ties, our responsibility to a friendly country in our region and given our national security interest in a stable, independent and peaceful Afghanistan which will remain a priority.

‘On Pakistan’ - With Pakistan we have maintained that a stable Pakistan at peace with itself and the region is a desirable goal. We wish to address our differences with Pakistan through dialogue. On several occasions we have conveyed to the Pakistani leadership our desire to engage in meaningful discussions and to develop our bilateral relations in a positive manner. At the same time, we made it clear that a meaningful dialogue will only be possible following the fulfillment by Pakistan of its commitment not to allow its territory to be used for terrorist activities against India. Pakistan must honour the pledges made in this regard. Following the Mumbai attacks of 26 November 2008, Pakistan has taken some steps under the pressure of evidence presented to them. However, we are still to see Pakistan take effective steps to end infiltration and dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism.

‘On China’ - There is space for both of us to grow and meet our aspirations. China is now India’s largest trading partner and there is congruence in our views on many global issues but there are outstanding bilateral issues that should be resolved peacefully through dialogue.

‘On ASEAN and East Asia’ - With ASEAN we have signed a Free Trade Agreement. It is another milestone in our Look East policy. Our relationship with Japan has entered a new phase in the last few years. We are adding significant elements of political, economic and security cooperation to our relationship. A new South-South partnership is being built in the IBSA framework with South Africa and Brazil.

‘On Russia and the United States’ - Our relations with Russia are time tested and we are giving them a contemporary definition in areas such as nuclear energy, space and defence. With the United States, we are going to build on the positive momentum of the last few years. Our new dialogue architecture would reflect the increasingly global character of our bilateral dialogue. India's established capabilities in high technology and our unimpeachable record of using these technologies in a responsible and transparent manner are creating opportunities for upgrading our access to high technology from the major powers.

'On the Doha Round of negotiations' - I would like to stress that timely and successful conclusion of the Doha Round on the basis of its development mandate is even more important today particularly in the backdrop of the global economic and financial crisis to restore confidence in the global economy and markets, as also to guard against emerging protectionist tendencies and to protect the livelihoods of the poor and marginalized, particularly in our rural sectors.

EAM stressed that 'economic work' of our Missions abroad is increasing in importance as India's engagement with the world has deepened and our global trade has grown substantially in recent years. In fact with many countries bilateral, economic and commercial relations have become the driving force for more intensive engagement and for many other relationships, are providing anchor for more stable relations. Our "soft power" is a tremendous asset to promote India's visibility and influence in the global arena today. This is manifest in the outreach afforded to us across the world by our culture, cinema, technology, diaspora and other important elements of our soft power. We need to develop our capabilities to utilize this asset to the fullest extent'.

Earlier, welcoming the 112 Heads of Mission who have gathered in New Delhi for the Conference, Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao in her opening remarks spoke of the role, the agenda and the challenges confronting Indian diplomats, particularly the Heads of Mission, today. She said that the Indian diplomat today needed to introspect on how his or her practice of the art of diplomacy and the tools used for it, must adapt, or change, in response to the challenges in the world and the decentralization of the international landscape. She said that the context in which our diplomats work today was defined not only by the external dimensions of India's foreign policy but the country's domestic needs and aspirations. She stressed the need for future oriented strategies when it comes to addressing such issues as personnel strength and interaction with academic and research institutions as part of a 'retooling' process.

She referred to a note recorded by India's first Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru in 1953, on our administrative system within government,— 'Today we are faced with a dynamic situation which requires a rapid pace of development and continuous adaptation to changing conditions. We have thus to bring our administrative structure in line with these, or, we fail". Most importantly, Prime Minister Nehru had advocated the need to "always have a sense of the organic unity of the whole, whether this is the world or India, or the Government of India or a particular Ministry". And this Foreign Secretary emphasized, particularly applied to the Ministry of External Affairs.

She dwelt on key and diverse aspects like training, capacity building, greater use of technology, inter-agency cooperation, security, media relations, effective communications, Indian community, consular matters etc.

During the interactive session that followed HOMs made a number of suggestions on strengthening communication and exchanges between the Missions and the Ministry.

052. Press Release of the Prime Minister's Office containing the gist of the Speech of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh while addressing the Conference of Heads of Mission.

New Delhi, August 25, 2009.

The Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh, today addressed the Conference of Indian Heads of Missions organized by the Ministry of External Affairs.

The Prime Minister emphasized the integral link of India's foreign policy with domestic policies particularly economic policy. He noted that the country's foreign policy should be aimed at addressing the challenges of mass poverty, ignorance and disease in the country, which were the primary concern of the Indian state and polity. He stated that despite the global economic slowdown, the Indian economy was still the second fastest growing economy in the world, but all out efforts were needed to put the economy back on a sustained high rate of growth if the challenges of poverty and disease were to be effectively addressed.

In this context, the Prime Minister identified three pillars of our global engagement -sustaining capital inflows to supplement our investment efforts, the need to take advantage of rapid scientific and technological developments in the world which provide an opportunity for India to leap frog its technological development, and the need to ensure that the country's growth is not constrained by scarcity of natural resources. All these required active engagement by India in all multilateral fora, and in the shaping of the world order, whether in the field of trade, international finance or the international economy. Insularity was not an option, and India should play a role in the international arena in a manner that makes a positive contribution to finding solutions to major global challenges, whether in the field of trade or climate change.

The Prime Minister highlighted the fact that the India has been a victim of terrorism and it was essential that global terrorism is tackled with full vigour and resolve to ensure the continuing advancement of the country. India has a stake in the prosperity and stability of all our South Asian neighbours. We should strive to engage our neighbours constructively and resolve differences through peaceful means and negotiations.

0053. Interview of National Security Advisor M. K. Narayanan with Indrani Bagchi of the Times of India.

New Delhi, August 29, 2009.

After the political storm over the India-Pakistan joint statement at Sharm el-Sheikh, is India still going ahead with a meeting between the two foreign ministers at UNGA?

I would presume so. We have never fought shy of meeting Pakistan's leaders. That's why Prime Minister met Asif Zardari in Yekaterinburg, and Gilani in Sharm el-Sheikh. The Indian standpoint has been that we will not resume the composite dialogue until we see concrete evidence that Pakistan has acted against terrorism in a manner that we feel comfortable. That position remains. I don't see any change in that position at any time. People have tried to misinterpret the Sharm el-Sheikh joint statement.

But the statement delinked dialogue from action on terrorism, apart from a controversial reference to Balochistan. Wasn't that a departure?

It doesn't delink. That's a wrong reading of the document. It's possible that somebody may read it that way but that's certainly not the intention. I don't think there has been any change in our position. There was a reference to Balochistan in the document because it found a mention in the discussions. It's possible that someone could read a meaning into it. I don't think there is any particular meaning.

Are we heeding the Pakistan request to send the foreign secretary to Islamabad before the UNGA?

I think since the external affairs minister will be in New York for the UNGA. That would be the more appropriate place for the foreign secretaries to meet*.

* Pakistan on August 28 had accused India of "hesitating" over the resumption of the stalled peace process due to its internal political situation" and insisted that dialogue was the only way forward for the two countries. Pakistan Foreign Minister Shah Mahmood Qureshi, in an interview to a TV news channel, ruled out the possibility of Pakistan acting on advice from the West to shift troops from the Indian border to focus on the campaign against militancy along the Afghan frontier, terming it as Islamabad's "internal decision". However, he dispelled the impression that there was a deadlock between India and Pakistan over New Delhi's call for Islamabad to take action against outlawed JuD chief Hafiz Mohammad Saeed for his links to the Mumbai attacks and demanded "legally tenable evidence" against the LeT founder.

What are the expected highlights of PM's Washington visit in November?

We're looking for that one big idea that will symbolize the relationship, just as we had a major achievement like the civil nuclear agreement in 2005. That was then the one big idea. It's not that the deal alone was important. I think that far more than the deal, the fact that a country like the US and a country like India could reach an agreement like this reflected the maturing of the relationship.

So, we need to one such big ticket item now to show a continuity of that relationship with the new US administration?

I think the relationship itself is very warm. The PM has had very positive meetings with leaders of the new administration. I don't see any problem with the relationship. The previous administration was extremely accommodative of India. We need to see whether the new administration will see us in the same way. Across the world, there is a great deal of respect for India and for the Indian leadership. Since this is the first state visit arranged by the Obama administration, we are keen to cement it with something substantial.

You have just completed the 13th round of boundary talks with China. While there is no progress on that front, will the talks now be embedded in the larger strategic dialogue?

The Chinese side showed keen interest in widening the ambit of the dialogue. But it didn't detract from what we discussed on the border. We had 14 hours of discussions. There's always progress. Certainly we haven't yet settled the border issue. But each time we meet there is greater understanding.

What is the state of play on the nuclear deal?

There are two issues. First, we have to file a declaration in the IAEA. We are taking things cautiously, doing things step by step. If we take a step we cannot retrace that would make things difficult. We've now reached a stage when we are comfortable and we will file the declaration. And we will fill in the Annexure, which is part of the Separation plan. Once you enter into an international agreement we do not back out. The declaration is the final step as far as the IAEA is concerned. With the US, discussions are underway on the reprocessing agreement under 6(iii) of the 123 agreement.

What are your view on the Afghanistan election? Do you think the US could be tempted to cut and run since the war appears to be going so badly for them?

The very fact that elections could be held, despite the violence and threats and with so many contenders, is no mean achievement. Its more than many other countries have done.

Nuclear scientist, K Santhanam says we need to test our thermonuclear weapon again because Pokharan II was a “fizzle”. Is that correct?

It's untrue. This is a matter that has been examined in great detail. Several measurements have been applied, specific observations have been made. The fact that we had a 45-kiloton successful thermonuclear test is now well proven the world over. We don't need to carry out another test.

054. Response by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to questions from a leading daily newspaper on the achievements of Ministry of External Affairs during the first 100 days of the United Progressive Alliance Government.

New Delhi, September 2, 2009.

1. What significant direction has the External Affairs Ministry taken in the first 100 days?

Ans: The direction of India's foreign policy flows directly from the aspirations of our people. Inspired by the vision of our founding fathers, our foreign policy is distinguished by a tradition of continuity and consensus.

In its first hundred days, the External Affairs Ministry has pursued a multi-dimensional foreign policy of seeking strategic engagement, partnership and dialogue with all major global players, without creating any contradiction or hyphenation between one set of relations and another. Our approach is one marked by maturity and balance in the conduct of international relations. Today, as we get more and more connected with the world, we seek to creatively respond to new challenges and opportunities.

India's steady ascendance as an economic power has expanded her circle of interaction and engagement with the rest of the world. One of the main challenges of our foreign policy lies in creating and maintaining a regional and international environment which would enable us to sustain a high rate of economic growth, create more opportunities for Indian entrepreneurship and enable India to realize her vast, latent potential. Under the leadership of the Prime Minister, the pursuit of enhanced trade, investment inflows, technology transfers, energy security and other economic imperatives has become an overarching imperative of our foreign policy. At the same time, my endeavour is to effectively leverage India's established capabilities, particularly in the field of frontier technologies like space, information technology, biotechnology and pharmaceuticals, and her growing role in the global knowledge economy. (Emphasis as in the original)

Let me outline some of my own efforts in my first hundred days as the External Affairs Minister. I support a policy that ensures a peaceful periphery and a supportive international environment as the fundamental objective of India's foreign policy. In our neighbourhood, I have already visited Bhutan and exchanged views with my counterparts from Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Afghanistan, Nepal. I participated in the Af-Pak Ministerial meeting in the G8 plus outreach format. Among the major powers, I have personally engaged with my counterparts from USA, Russia, China and Japan, and am currently visiting Brazil. I visited Australia to personally seek the understanding and support of the Australian authorities for stopping the violent attacks against Indian students.

At the core of the continuity in our foreign policy is autonomy of decision-making and independence of thought and action. Our prominent role in the Non Aligned Movement was recently reaffirmed in the 15th NAM Ministerial, followed by the Summit in Egypt, which I attended. At the recent ASEAN-India and ARF Post-forum Ministerial in Phuket, our Look-East policy received further impetus. ASEAN-India FTA has now been signed. The recent India-EU Ministerial troika in Prague helped us broaden our dialogue and consolidate relations with the EU, our largest trading partner. I will personally ensure that Africa and Latin America becomes a major focus area for us.

2. What new initiatives is the Government taking to improve relations with neighbours?

Ans: As I have already said, India would like to have a peaceful neighborhood in which all South Asian nations can work in concert, to attain the common objective of growth and development, as well as combat challenges especially the menace of terrorism. Our destinies are interlinked and together we can usher in a new era of peace and prosperity. We are deepening ties with a number of South Asian countries as also to see democratic traditions taking deeper roots in our neighborhood. Our broad approach with all our neighbours, including China, Bangladesh, Nepal and Sri Lanka remains one where we are proceeding ahead with all-round cooperation and exchanges in areas of mutual interest, without holding progress hostage to difficult, outstanding issues. Under the SAARC framework, we will move ahead with implementation of projects in many areas, including on trade and economy, culture and education. Another important framework that we seek to strengthen, in order to improve connectivity with our North East, is BIMSTEC.

3. What is current status of composite dialogue with Pakistan?

Ans: The Composite Dialogue had been paused after the terrorist attack on Mumbai. We do sincerely believe it is in our vital interest to engage and normalize our relations with Pakistan. At the same time we are very clear that any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan can only be based on fulfillment of its commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow its territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India. Steps therefore to address the issue of terrorism will be in the interest of the bilateral relationship and also in the interest of Pakistan.

4. The Opposition has accused govt. of compromising India's strategic interests with the US, during Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's visit. What is your argument?

Ans: India's foreign relations with all countries including the USA are based on her national interest. We have a strategic relationship with the US, as we have with several other countries. Secretary of State visited India during 17-21 July 2009. During the visit a revised bilateral architecture for enhancement and deepening of India-US bilateral relationship in science technology, education, health, economy and trade, defence and security, energy, environment and Climate Change among other subjects was announced. These are areas of bilateral engagement which compliment our national development goals.

During the visit, both the countries signed two agreements - one on science and technology and the other on space cooperation. Besides, we also agreed to a standard formulation on 'End Use Monitoring (EUM)' which would be included in future Letters of Offer and Acceptance for procurement of defence equipment from the US. This is a standard requirement of the US Government and some 82 countries to whom the US supplies defence equipment have agreed to it. There is nothing in the EUM which compromises our strategic interests. USA has not been given any unilateral right of access to our military sites. I have made a Statement in the Parliament on this account. Besides, we had so far been fulfilling the EUM requirement case by case; the agreement only streamlines an ad hoc system that was being followed till now for defence procurement from the USA.

055. Speech by Minister of Commerce and Industry Anand Sharma at the WTO Ministerial Meeting "Re energising Doha -- A Commitment to Development."

New Delhi, September 3, 2009.

"Excellencies, Director General Mr. Lamy,

Senior Officials, Ambassadors, and distinguished delegates,

It gives me immense pleasure to welcome you all to Delhi Ministerial Meeting. After assuming my present responsibility as Commerce and Industry Minister of Republic of India, I have had the privilege of meeting many of you on several occasions. I am delighted that we now have yet another opportunity to renew our acquaintance. I look also forward to an equally warm relationship with other fellow Ministers whom I have not had the opportunity to meet earlier.

We are encouraged by your understanding and by your enthusiastic support for this initiative for the Delhi meeting. Your presence is a testimony of your commitment to the successful conclusion of the Doha Development Round and also underscores your faith in the robustness of the transparent, rule-based and democratic multilateral trading system that the WTO represents.

In less than a year, world leaders have reaffirmed their commitment to an early conclusion of Doha Round at Washington, London, Bali, Paris, L'Aquila, and Singapore. In their unanimity lies a message for us, which stresses the need and importance of a fair and equitable international trading system, which is particularly vital in the present challenging economic environment.

Leaders were united in their view that sustaining trade and investment flows is critical for the future prosperity of developed and developing economies alike. They recognised that one of the main threats to a revival of trade flows is the rising protectionist pressures, and continued delay in concluding the Doha Round. Therefore, strengthening the multilateral trading system by concluding the Doha Round at the earliest is vital is an imperative.

A question has been asked by some that why India took the initiative to host this meeting when Heads of State and Governments have already, in no uncertain terms, signaled what needs to be done. But let's be frank in acknowledging that even the unequivocal expression of political resolve has not yet been translated into action. Many of you have shared your concerns with me over the imperceptible progress in re-energizing the negotiations. This feeling was also articulated when officials met in Geneva in July.

The economic crisis and the ensuing turmoil is rocking the global economy. Domestic pre-occupations of some Member Countries over the past twelve months has been another proximate reason for the pause in negotiations. But that was not all. We also realise that individually, the international groupings of nations from which declarations of support for the Doha Round have emanated, simply did not represent the full spectrum of the WTO membership. The Delhi meeting constitutes a microcosm of the entire WTO membership, representing all shades of opinion and interests. This would be the first occasion since July 2008 that such a meeting is taking place to give a determined push to the multilateral process.

Together, we need to work in this spirit and go beyond yet another reaffirmation and work together collectively to provide guidance for a clear road map of multilateral engagement in the months ahead, remaining conscious of the 2010 timeline. I trust that you would all agree that is the value addition this Ministerial meeting has to provide: this is what we must strive for.

I trust that you would all agree that this is neither the appropriate forum nor the opportune time to discuss specific issues in individual areas of the negotiations. That is best left to the multilateral process in Geneva. Instead, discussions here ought to mainly focus on the best way to spark the multilateral negotiations to move the Round to a quick closure. After all, the intention is to build a broad-based consensus on how Ministers would like to see the process of negotiation fast-tracked. Negotiators would be able to focus fully on technical issues only if we work together to remove the obstacles coming in the way of multilateral discussions and provide clear directions on how the multilateral process at the WTO can be re-energised.

I understand that senior officials who met yesterday have had a productive discussion and have identified some of the critical process issues which need to be addressed on priority if the Doha Round has to be concluded as envisaged by some leaders. I am sure you have been briefed by your senior officials about their discussions.

In some quarters, it has been suggested that most issues have been settled and we are almost in 'end game'. However, if we look at the texts of modalities on NAMA and Agriculture alone, it would be apparent that there are still a few gaps and large number of unresolved issues. In some instances, the architecture of a solution is not yet fully in sight. In others, there still remain negotiating gaps that need to be sufficiently narrowed before Ministers can collectively outline the way forward come up with fair solutions.

All these issues need to be extensively discussed at the technical level by senior officials. This will take time and needs to be factored in when we decide on a schedule for the ensuing months to determine when Agriculture/NAMA modalities can be meaningfully concluded.

Suggestions for new approaches have generated much debate, may be at the cost of some negotiating capital. In light of the 2010 timeline, Ministers may like to reflect on the necessity for and the implications of changing a tried and tested process. While we follow the established process of multilateral negotiations, we need also to look at various approaches to feed the multilateral process to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

We must remain alive to the importance of inclusiveness and transparency of the process. These are indisputably key success factors for any strategy to conclude the Doha Round, particularly in a body of the size and diversity of the WTO. We cannot risk alienating any of those involved.

The fact that this is a Development Round bears repetition. The Doha Ministerial Declaration of 14 November 2001, while recalling the preamble to the Marrakesh Agreement stated "We shall continue to make positive efforts designed to ensure that developing countries and especially the least developed among them, secure a share in the growth of world trade commensurate with the needs of their economic development". This mandate is the bedrock of the Doha Round. The final outcome must correct the historical distortions and address structural flaws in the global trading regime, while responding to the legitimate concerns and aspirations of the poor in the developing world.

We must also recall that the Ministerial mandate at Hong Kong emphasized the need to effectively and meaningfully integrate Least Developed Countries (LDCs) into the multilateral trading system.

The Ministerial mandate at Hong Kong also adopted a sequential approach to negotiations giving agriculture and NAMA frontal position to be followed by others. Since time is of the essence and in order to maintain a balance within the single undertaking, Members could also reflect on how, without departing from the Hong Kong mandate, we can consider moving other issues on the agenda forward. Can parallel negotiations in Services and other areas be taken on board in a more proactive manner?

In order to take the process at Geneva to its logical conclusion, engagement and close monitoring would be required, I am sure this will put our human resource capacities to severest test. This would also necessitate a more well thought out and agreed roadmap for overall negotiations as well as specifically for each segment of negotiations. Members may wish to reflect on how we intend to proceed to prepare this agreed roadmap. I request each of you to bear these issues in mind while making your statements and interventions.

Let me turn now to the structure of our programme over the next two days.

As you have seen from the agenda for today, we will begin with a Statement from DG Lamy. I am sure, we are all keen to hear his thoughts on the way forward. His single minded zeal and indefatigable efforts to bring the negotiations back on track, each time they faltered, have yielded rich dividends in the past.

I will then invite the Chairs of the Negotiating Groups on Agriculture, NAMA and Services to speak. There are of course, other equally important areas in the single undertaking but we are going by the sequence decided by Ministers at Hong Kong. The Agriculture and NAMA Chairs have already, in July this year, outlined how they propose to organize technical work in September. I am sure they will now be able to provide us all with some more details on that process.

The success of the WTO is, in large measure, attributable to the stellar role played by various coalitions. Without them, it would have been very hard to adhere to the WTO principles of transparency, inclusiveness and consensus-based decision-making. They have been the rallying force behind these negotiations and have been able to give voice to issues both large and small that may otherwise never have come to the fore. We will hear from each of them today.

We have also scheduled statements by some Members, interspersed with the group statements. I welcome and in fact, urge others who wish to make statements to please do so. It is with this in mind that we have intentionally avoided packing too much into our schedule, in the hope that this will lead to a better exchange of ideas.

We have left the agenda for tomorrow relatively unstructured at this stage so as to enable an open and candid discussion on the issues that Members would be flagging today.

I am confident that we will have a productive and useful engagement over the next two days and I look forward to working constructively with you all in a collective endeavour to build a broad-based consensus on the way forward.

I wish you all a very pleasant stay in Delhi.

Thank you."

056. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Commerce on Ministerial meeting on "Re-Energizing Doha - a Commitment to Development".

New Delhi, September 3, 2009.

A ministerial meeting of more than 35 members of WTO on "Re-Energizing Doha - A Commitment to Development" was held on 3 September 2009 at New Delhi. The meeting was chaired by India's Commerce and Industry Minister, Shri Anand Sharma.

The meeting started with a two minute silence to pay respect to Shri Y.S.R. Reddy, Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh on his tragic and sudden demise.

In the meeting there was a unanimous affirmation of the need to expeditiously conclude the Doha Round, particularly in the present critical global economic situation. All agreed that there was a need to resume talks in Geneva to conclude the long under negotiations Doha Development Round of WTO which began in 2001. The development dimension and the need to address the concerns of LDCs was emphasized. The Ministers profusely appreciated the initiative taken by India in organizing a Ministerial meeting in the current difficult economic environment. They also appreciated India bringing together practically all shades of opinion and interests at the WTO in an effort to bring about a broad-based consensus on the road ahead for the Doha Development Round.

In his opening remarks the Commerce and Industry Minister Shri Anand Sharma explained the background for calling the meeting and sought all present to provide guidance for a road map for the multilateral engagement in the coming months. He asked ministers to discuss the process required to reach the goal and to build a consensus on the way forward. He observed that the Delhi meeting constituted a microcosm of the entire WTO membership, representing all shades of opinion and interests and this would be the first occasion since July 2008 that such a meeting was taking place to give a determined push to the multilateral process.

The Chair observed that as this meeting was intended to build a broad-based consensus on how Ministers would like to see the process of negotiation fast-tracked, its focus would be process-related issue rather than specific issues in individual areas of the negotiations.

Initiating the discussions, the DG WTO observed that the conclusion of the Doha Round was an urgent requirement as per the signals emanating from world leaders. However, he acknowledged that these signals had not created negotiating dynamics; hence the need to translate these signals into acceleration of work for conclusion of the Round. The Chairs of the WTO negotiating groups on Agriculture, NAMA (industrial goods) and Services provided an overview of the status of negotiations in their respective areas and outlined their work plans in the ensuing months.

The Chair then invited coordinators of various coalition groups and some member countries to make their statements. These included the Cairns Group, G-20, G-33, Cotton-4, G-10, NAMA-11, African Group, African-Caribbean-Pacific Group (ACP), LDCs, Small and Vulnerable Economies (SVEs) and CARICOM (Caribbean Community).

In addition, statements were made by some Member countries in their individual capacity, including, the EC, China, the US, Brazil, South Korea, South Africa, Australia. The meeting will continue on 4 September 2009 for further discussion on some of the key issues raised by the Ministers today.

057. Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the meeting of the Editors Guild.

New Delhi, September 10, 2009.

President of Editors Guild of India Mr. Rajdeep Sardesai,

Secretary General Mr. Sachidananda Murthy,

Friends,

It is indeed a pleasure for me to be here to interact with members of the prestigious Editors Guild of India. I would like to thank you for the cordial invitation and for affording me this platform, for sharing my views and getting your perspectives.

I deem it a privilege to have been called upon to navigate the course of India's foreign policy at this important juncture, when the stock of India is steadily rising. India is an emerging power, regarded as a responsible and mature global player. In the last three months that I have been at the helm of affairs, I have been struck by the genuine and universal respect that India enjoys for her democratic credentials, economic growth, constructive role in international affairs and vision of a just and non-discriminatory world order. There are also certain expectations from us, due to our size, geographical location and principled position on international issues.

Indian foreign policy establishment today is called upon to move simultaneously on various fronts, be it our engagement with our extended neighbourhood, major powers and vital regions, or safeguarding of our interests on global issues like terrorism, energy and food security, UN reforms, climate change and a fair and equitable WTO framework.

The direction of India's foreign policy flows directly from the aspirations of our people. Our main objective is ensuring a conducive international environment for consolidating our strategic autonomy and furthering our economic interests, such as sustainable double digit rate of growth, enhanced trade and investment inflows, technology transfers and energy security. That is the objective that the Ministry of External Affairs is striving to work towards.

Let me elaborate and touch upon some of the important facets of our relations, opportunities and challenges. In our immediate neighbourhood, I have already visited Bhutan and exchanged views with my counterparts from Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Afghanistan, Nepal and Maldives. I also participated in the Af-Pak Ministerial meeting in the G8 plus outreach format. It is only when all South Asian nations work together, in concert, that we can attain our common objective of growth and development. Our destinies are interlinked.

It is in our vital interest to normalize our relations with Pakistan. However, we are at a stage where it is for Pakistan to determine the kind of relationship it wants to have with India. Any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan can only be based on fulfillment of its commitment, in letter and spirit, not to allow its territory to be used in any manner for terrorist activities against India. The Mumbai attack was launched from Pakistan and the conspiracy behind the attack was hatched there. Clearly the onus is on Pakistan to unveil the conspiracy. We have sought to assist them in that task by providing vital evidence.

Let me emphasize that it is our considered position that there should be concrete action against those guilty of the Mumbai terrorist attack before there can be any meaningful dialogue with Pakistan. Until the Mumbai attack, India was conducting the composite dialogue with utmost sincerity. But we cannot have terrorism and negotiations at the same time. Pakistan has to prove its credentials by implementing its assurances.

With respect to Sri Lanka, our immediate focus is to see that the process of resettlement and rehabilitation of more than 2.7 lakh IDPs in their original homes is achieved as early as possible. We are in constant dialogue with the Sri Lankan Government on the issue. On its part, India has allocated Rs. 500 crores for relief and rehabilitation of IDPs. We are also actively assisting Sri Lanka in de-mining, which is an essential pre-requisite for people to return to their homes. Recognizing the importance of restoring livelihoods, we are also going to assist Sri Lanka to revive agriculture in the North. A delegation led by ICAR (Indian Council of Agricultural Research) will visit Sri Lanka next week, to have extensive discussions with stakeholders in Sri Lanka on the specifics of our agricultural assistance.

In Bangladesh, we welcome the return to multiparty democratic politics. After their elections earlier this year, both sides have an historic opportunity to take our relations to greater heights. India remains committed to strengthening all round cooperation and connectivity. We have taken several initiatives to give momentum to our ties, including during the visit of Foreign Minister Dr. Dipu Moni, which concluded today. You may have already seen the Joint Press Statement issued today. We now look forward to the visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina in the near future.

Our other key neighbour Nepal is currently undergoing a democratic transition. A peace process is underway. The Prime Minister of Nepal visited India recently. He stressed that bringing the peace process in Nepal to a positive and meaningful conclusion, writing a new Constitution within the stipulated time-frame and accelerating the pace of economic development, were the main priorities of his Government. We support the peace process, and stand ready to assist them in any manner they want us to, including developmental assistance. Our economic assistance to Nepal last year was over Rs. 128 crores.

We welcomed the process of holding of presidential and provincial elections in Afghanistan on August 20. We will respect the choice of the Afghan people. In general, we are gratified at the progress made in Afghanistan in recent years, and are confident that our historical links with the people of Afghanistan will only get better. With a bilateral commitment of US$ 1.2 billion, India has been assisting Afghanistan in building a stable, democratic and pluralistic society. We have decided to establish an India-Afghanistan Partnership Council aimed at all-round capacity development.

As regards the internal situation in Afghanistan, we are concerned at the deterioration in the internal security situation. The resurgence of Taliban and Al Qaeda in Afghanistan is a threat to the progress made since 2002. It is all the more important for the international community to resolutely counter this threat by maintaining its commitment and extending unwavering support to the Government of Afghanistan with humanitarian and reconstruction assistance.

Let me now turn to China, our northern neighbour. Friendly cooperation with China is a key foreign policy priority. I met my Chinese counterpart recently in Phuket. We have a significant trade-economic relationship with China. We consult each other on global issues and have a similarity of outlook. We also have our differences, especially on the boundary question. Both sides are working towards a fair and reasonable settlement of the entire boundary, as per agreed guidelines. The 13th Round of Special Representatives (SR) talks concluded last month.

On the issue of border incursions, I would like to emphasize that there is an established mechanism to deal with such situations. Both sides have agreed that pending the resolution of the border issue, peace and tranquility must be maintained on the LAC. Moreover, India is monitoring the situation constantly and there can and will be no lowering of our defences in this regard. Our borders are secure and it serves no purpose to create excessive alarm.

We have a strong interest in crafting closer ties with fellow Asian countries. At the recent ASEAN-India and ARF Post-forum Ministerial in Phuket, our Look-East policy received further impetus. After six years of intensive negotiations, the ASEAN-India Agreement on Trade In Goods was signed last month. It will give India a much larger business access to the ASEAN market. Our annual trade with ASEAN is expected to increase from US$ 40bn to US$ 60bn. Similar Free Trade Agreements for trade in Services and Investments are to follow. For our country as a whole, the FTA would benefit us, though it may entail some hardship for certain areas. A negative list has been drawn up to protect some commodities and lighten the burden.

We similarly attach a lot of significance to our ties with Japan, South Korea and Australia. Our relationship with Japan has entered a new phase in the last few years. There is now a new government in Japan led by the DPJ. I had met their leaders recently in Tokyo, and we will engage them formally and bilaterally very soon.

The seriousness of the issue of safety and security of our students in Australia was brought home to the Australian leadership during my visit to Australia last month. This has resulted in a visible improvement in the situation and accelerated the review of unscrupulous institutions. Our relations otherwise with them are in good shape and are expanding rapidly.

As I said earlier, we have been simultaneously paying great attention to our relations with major powers. Our relationship with Russia is time-tested. Our wide-ranging cooperation in strategic areas, such as defence, nuclear energy and space, forms the solid bedrock of our relationship. Rashtrapati ji has just returned from a very successful state visit to Russia and Tajikistan. I will be traveling to Moscow next month for the next India-Russia Joint Commission, and meetings with the Russian leadership.

With USA we have a robust and multifaceted agenda of cooperation. Secretary Clinton, during her July visit, called the present phase of the relationship as 3.0 (third phase) and hoped that the strengthening of Indo-US partnership would be one of the signature accomplishments of both the governments. We would like to build upon the meaningful work done in the previous years and are pleased at the bipartisan support that the relationship enjoys in USA. The civil nuclear cooperation agreement is progressing well. We are presently discussing a regulatory framework for commercially operationalizing the agreement. We have also reached an agreement on a standard text for end-use monitoring (EUM), which paves the way for sale and/or transfer of defence articles and services by US companies to India. Let me stress here that the EUM agreement does not compromise our sovereignty - there is no automatic access to Indian military sites. PM's visit to USA on November 24 would be the first State visit by a foreign leader in the Obama Administration.

Moving on, I would like to note that we have vital interests in West Asia, Latin America, Africa and Europe. A new South-South partnership is being built in the IBSA framework with South Africa and Brazil, a country that I recently visited. West Asia is critical to our energy security and economic well being. The sheer volume of remittances coming from the region and our increasing trade with the countries of West Asia should make this obvious. Naturally we have an interest in the stability of the Gulf and the peaceful resolution of the Iranian question. With Africa we have enjoyed close ties, which we would like strengthened through a mutually beneficial partnership. The Namibian President's visit last month was the first incoming State visit after the UPA government returned to power.

I thought of surveying the state of play of our relations with some of our key partners. Let me pause here. I will be happy to take questions. I would also welcome your thoughts and suggestions.

Thank you.

058. Address by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Conference of Directors General of Police and Inspectors General of Police.

New Delhi, September 15, 2009.

Let me begin by saying that I consider your Conference a valuable opportunity to interact with the leaders of the Police, Intelligence and Security Agencies on vital issues relating to internal security. I hope you have been having discussions which will enhance and deepen our understanding of internal security matters and will also lead to a consensus on what needs to be done to strengthen the country's internal security. I very much look forward to concrete, implementable recommendations emerging out of your deliberations on this very important subject. I congratulate all those officers who have been presented with the President's Police Medal for distinguished and meritorious service and I wish them greater success in the years to come.

I would also like to take this opportunity to interact our Police forces, our Intelligence Agencies and our Security Forces in general for their contribution to the free and fair conduct of the recently held general for their. The relative peace that prevailed both during and before the polls was in large measure facilitated by your vigilant efforts. You deserve our country's sincere thanks for this excellent performance.

My colleague, the Home Minister would have outlined the internal security challenges our country faces. I would therefore briefly touch upon only a few of these issues. As far as terrorism is concerned, during the past year we have achieved some major successes. Many terrorist modules have been dismantled and arrests of several important terrorists have taken place. It is on account of your alertness that we have not had a serious terrorist attack since November last year. But our success in preventing terrorist attacks can be sustained only at the price of unrelenting vigilance. There are many developments taking place in our country and outside which have a bearing on our internal security. It is important to understand their true nature and the exact way they can and they could affect us. We also need to understand better why many more local youth are being induced into participating in terrorist activities and how they are being recruited, indoctrinated and trained. The factors that cause social disharmony and alienation should be clearly known so that we can work to eliminate them. I urge you to pay particular attention to these aspects.

I have consistently held that in many ways, the Left Wing Extremism is, perhaps, the gravest internal security threat our country faces. We have discussed this in the last five years and I would like to say frankly that we have not achieved as much success as we would have liked in containing this menace. It is a matter of concern that despite our efforts, the level of violence in the affected States continues to rise.

As I have stated before, dealing with Left Wing extremism requires a nuanced strategy, a holistic approach - it cannot be treated simply as a law and order problem. Despite its sanguinary nature, the movement manages to retain the support of a section of the tribal communities and the poorest of the poor in many affected areas. It has influence among certain sections of the civil society, the intelligentsia and the youth. It still retains a certain élan. All this adds to the complexity of the problem. I expect you to keep this in mind as you devise newer and better strategies to deal with this problem.

The situation in the North-Eastern parts of our country is also far from comfortable. In two of the States, viz., Manipur and Assam, current levels of violence give us cause for concern. In addition, extortion and intimidation have become a menace across most of the States in the region and they have reached a point where they constitute a serious hampering of the implementation of a number of development projects in these States. I believe, it should be possible, to bring about a substantial improvement in the situation if there is better security management. I would, therefore, enjoin upon the DGPs of the States in the North-East to insist upon, and achieve, higher levels of professionalism from the Forces they command. Firm but compassionate handling of law and order matters, can certainly bring about substantial improvement in the prevailing state of affairs. Particularly so, as in terms of number, we are dealing with a very limited number of people who have gone stray. If we do not and we cannot deal with them at the present stage of our development, it might be more difficult at a later date to tame these evil forces.

In the case of Jammu & Kashmir, we have reasons to be satisfied that elections to both the State Assembly and our Parliament during the past year were held in a peaceful atmosphere. The level of violence in the State has also come down and is perhaps at its lowest level since the beginning of insurgency in the late 80s.

But there is no scope for complacency. There are certain developments that are worrisome. Infiltration across the Line of Control and also via other routes such as Nepal, Bangladesh and the sea is going up. Encounters with armed militants have become more frequent in recent weeks and months. Secessionist and militant groups within the State are once again attempting to make common cause with outside elements and have embarked on a series of protest movements. The intention apparently is to create an impression of widespread turmoil in the State. We must not and I repeat we must not allow such a situation to develop. It is imperative that these disruptive efforts are contained, controlled and effectively checked.

I would like to compliment my friend, the Home Minister and his team for the efforts they have made in the last many months to improve our internal security situation. I am happy that action is being taken on the report of the task force that I had announced in this very last conference. This, together with the Action Plans drawn up by the Home Ministry, should go a long way to improve police performance, make the security Agencies more responsive to terrorist threats and improve their overall efficiency.

I would particularly like to commend to you the idea of our agencies developing strategic foresight to anticipate future surprise attacks like the one that took place in Mumbai in November last year. Improved intelligence generation and coordination are critical to developing such a capability. Also, like in other areas of governance, new technology and technological innovations can go a very long way in improving our performance in all dimensions of the internal security challenges. I am confident that the establishment of a secure net-centric information command structure would substantially improve the capabilities of our Agencies to deal with the internal security challenges.

Let me now move to certain areas in which the Central and State Governments need to take quick action. It is absolutely imperative that we strengthen policing at the grassroots level. The Police Station has to be the fulcrum around which this needs to take place. A large increase in the number of Police Stations along with raising the strength of Police Stations has to be undertaken. We need far higher numbers of policemen and policewomen to improve the present low police-population ratio of 145 per hundred thousand of population. As a first step, I would urge all of you to do everything possible to fill up the large number of vacancies that exist today at various levels in our police force. At the same time greater attention has to be paid to the provision of adequate amenities for the constables and I would like to particularly emphasize a provision of housing facilities for our policemen. A situation that a large number of policemen are compelled to make private arrangements for renting houses is fraught with serious problems, particularly, from the view point of enforcement of effective law and order.

But increasing numbers will not be enough. We need a new-age Policeman who is more professional, better-motivated, suitably empowered, well-trained, one who places greater emphasis on technology for investigation and other tasks. Emphasis should be on capacity building from the police station level itself, so that the police is better equipped. Each police station should aim at being self-sufficient and needs to be given the required resources in terms of anti-riot gear, better weapons, the nucleus of a mobile forensic unit and be connected to a networked criminal data base management system. Every city should have a modern police control room with digitized maps. The key here lies in the plans for the modernization of our Police force. I am aware that the Police modernization framework is being substantially enlarged, but I would still urge that modernization of the Police should receive the highest priority. Our police forces must operate on the frontiers of modern technology. We must also design systems and procedures which will minimize scope for corruption. We should have a sufficiently long-term perspective in this area and also the required amount of funds should be made available for the purpose.

I must specially emphasize here the critical importance of training for policemen. I understand that on the average a Police officer is retrained only once in about twenty years. This is totally inadequate in the changed circumstances and this must be rectified. It would also help if the police were to benchmark their training curricula with the syllabi and training methodologies of Police training institutions elsewhere in the world to ensure better quality. The world is changing and changing very rapidly and Police training must keep pace with the best practices being followed in the world.

Today, there is little research in subjects related to the police and policing. An analytical approach to the problems and difficulties that come in the way of better policing could prove extremely useful. I would like the proposals for the setting up of a National Police University and also of a National Institute for Law and Order-related subjects to be pursued more vigorously. We need first-rate institutions to come up, which are capable of looking at all such issues in a truly holistic manner paying particular attention to problems of effective policing in rural areas as well as in major metropolitan cities and thereby create a body of literature on all these vital subjects.

I conclude by reminding you of your solemn obligation towards the common citizen, someone who has little by way of resources to defend himself or herself against crime and criminals. Indeed, it is your solemn duty to protect the weak and the defenceless. Those who seek to promote communal violence and discord have to be dealt with firmly. Special efforts must be made to establish a relationship of trust and confidence between our police forces and the minority communities. You must not fail in this aspect. The underprivileged and weaker sections of our society- the minorities, the SCs and STs, women and senior citizens- should feel adequate confidence in the ability of our police force to protect. The common man should go about his daily life with a sense of security. He should have faith in the policeman and the police station. And this I believe is the real test of our efforts, a test that we cannot afford to fail.

As I conclude, I wish you all the very best practices being efforts to strengthen India's internal security. I am confident that we will collectively succeed in meeting this enormous challenge. May God bless your paths.

059. Speech of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Award Ceremony of the Indira Gandhi Prize for Peace, Disarmament and Development.

New Delhi, September 30, 2009.

It is a pleasure to speak at this function to felicitate Dr Mohamed ElBaradei with the Indira Gandhi Prize.

This award was instituted in the memory of one of the greatest leaders of India and the modern world. Mrs. Indira Gandhi had an enlightened vision of human progress that grew from her deeply held belief in higher civilisational values cherished by all men and women. She was a powerful voice of the poor and the down trodden and worked for an international order based on the principle of equality of all nations. In her personal life and work she embodied strength, goodness and grace - human qualities that endeared her to her fellow countrymen and inspired people around the world.

It is befitting that the Indira Gandhi Prize honours those who have made significant contributions to peace, disarmament and development - causes that were so dear to her.

Today, we honor with this Award a distinguished diplomat, scholar, international civil servant and a world statesman. As the Director General of the IAEA since 1998, Dr ElBaradei has brought about a fundamental transformation in the way we look at atomic energy. The Nobel Peace Prize in 2005 recognised the efforts of Dr. ElBaradei and the IAEA in ensuring that nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is used in the safest possible way.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Nuclear energy is vital to meeting our energy and development needs, particularly those of large developing countries like India. The applications of nuclear energy in agriculture, medicine and industry have enormous potential. We need the concerted and collective efforts of the international community to promote the peaceful uses of nuclear energy as widely as possible. Its benefits should not remain confined to a privileged few.

The growth of nuclear energy must go hand in hand with measures to reduce and eliminate risks of misuse. We should work to strengthen public trust and confidence in issues related to nuclear safety and security.

The IAEA and its Statute weave together these important factors. The international community has a vital stake in strengthening global energy security through the use of nuclear energy as a clean, safe and sustainable energy source. So we should spare no effort in providing the necessary support to the IAEA to perform its functions as provided in its Statute.

India's long-standing relationship with the IAEA has been spotless. We are committed to providing all the necessary support for the IAEA to perform its designated role and functions to facilitate the expansion of nuclear energy.

The IAEA is a technical organization with a justifiable reputation for its competence and independence. But it does not work in isolation. During the past decade, the IAEA has had to work in a complex international environment.

It is a testimony to Dr ElBaradei's vision, integrity and leadership that the IAEA has emerged stronger over the years and is now seen as an indispensable international institution.

The role of the IAEA is bound to expand in the years ahead not just in the traditional areas of nuclear energy and applications, but also in helping nations secure themselves against other nuclear dangers, such as those posed by terrorists gaining access to nuclear materials.

Dr ElBaradei has been a vocal advocate of nuclear disarmament. He has played an invaluable role in generating the current positive momentum in the international debate on nuclear disarmament.

He has also spoken eloquently about global efforts at poverty reduction and conflict resolution and shown a deep understanding of the intrinsic links between peace, disarmament and development.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The successful conclusion of India's civil nuclear initiative was in no small measure due to the enlightened approach of Dr ElBaradei to the issues involved. I would like to convey to him the heartfelt appreciation of the Government and people of India. India is now poised for a major expansion of its nuclear programme in which international cooperation will be an important component.

A major milestone in this process was the conclusion of India's safeguards agreement and its Additional Protocol with the IAEA. This gives India the possibility of additionally accessing a whole range of technologies and resources from the rest of the world. It also enables the global nuclear industry to benefit from India's technical and industrial expertise.

I congratulate Dr. ElBaradei on the award of the Indira Gandhi Prize for Peace, Disarmament and Development. I take this opportunity to wish him a long and productive life and one of continuing service to humankind.

Thank you.

-----
Statement of Director General of the IAEA Dr. Mohamed ElBaradei while accepting the Award:

President Pratibha Patil, Vice President Hamid Ansari, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, Mrs Sonia Gandhi, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am greatly honoured and humbled - indeed privileged and moved - to accept the 2008 Indira Gandhi Prize for Peace, Disarmament and Development.

It is a fitting tribute to Indira Gandhi's vision that peace and disarmament should be linked with development in the prize that bears her name. For, like few other leaders, before or since, Indira Gandhi saw the big picture and understood the link between security and development. A tireless campaigner for nuclear disarmament, she recognized the insanity of an international security system rooted in the concept of mutual assured destruction. In one memorable image in 1983, when two nuclear-armed superpower blocs were still staring each other down, she said: "The hood of the cobra is spread. Humankind watches in frozen fear, hoping against hope that it will not strike."

Likewise, she recognized that a world economic order "based on domination and inequality" was not sustainable. "To help developing countries is not mere largesse," she told the United Nations General Assembly, adding: "What better investment can the North make in its own future than by turning today's deprived of the South into tomorrow's consumers?"

As we approach the 25th anniversary of Indira Gandhi's untimely death, it is easy to be discouraged and to conclude that the world has learned little in the meantime. Over one billion of our fellow human beings go to bed hungry every night and two billion people - one third of humanity - live on less than $2 per day.

Nuclear weapons, far from being eliminated by 2010, as Rajiv Gandhi urged in his landmark speech presenting a comprehensive action plan to the General Assembly in 1988, are still very much with us. There are still 27,000 nuclear warheads on this planet. If used, they would bring about "the end of life as we know it on our planet earth," to quote Rajiv Gandhi.

The current global condition is marked by inequity and insecurity. Conflicts have been left to fester for generations in many regions, from Palestine to the Korean Peninsula. The obscene inequality in the distribution of the wealth of the planet has persisted, while we continue to witness human life valued much more highly in some parts of the world than in others. Governments engaged in little more than hand-wringing while millions of innocent lives were lost in Rwanda, Congo, Darfur and other places, and the international community's "responsibility to protect" is too often notable by its absence. In the meantime, we continue to witness repression and denial of the most basic human rights in many parts of the world.

Global military spending was almost $1.5 trillion last year. That is 12 times what the developed world spent on official development assistance to the poor. The budget for all UN peacekeeping operations in the current year is about seven billion dollars. In other words, the world spends 200 times more on weapons of war than on keeping the peace.

But we must not lose hope. The Cold War ended and the cobra, luckily, did not strike. Nuclear disarmament is, after a long hiatus, finally back on the international agenda. Presidents Medvedev and Obama have made a commitment to cut their countries' nuclear arsenals by as much as a third. There is a real prospect of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty coming into force. And the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva has agreed to negotiate a treaty that would outlaw the production of fissile material for use in nuclear weapons. By demonstrating their irreversible commitment to achieving a world free from nuclear weapons, the weapon states can greatly contribute to the legitimacy of the non-proliferation regime and gain the moral authority to call on the rest of the world to curb the proliferation of these inhumane weapons.

I have no doubt that India, which as early as 1948 called for the elimination of nuclear weapons, will remain a powerful voice campaigning for a world free from nuclear weapons, in the tradition of Jawaharlal Nehru and both Indira and Rajiv Gandhi.

Although the misery of the world's bottom billion still shames us all, we should take some comfort in the fact that hundreds of millions of people, including here in India, have been lifted out of poverty in the last 25 years. India's economic metamorphosis has been dazzling. Much credit for this should go to the then Finance Minister Manmohan Singh and, of course, to the creativity and ingenuity of the Indian people. India has become a beacon of hope to the developing world.

India can take justifiable pride in being the world's largest democracy, in which 1.2 billion religiously, ethnically and linguistically diverse people co-exist peacefully, respecting and cherishing their diversity - and recognising that diversity is strength. India has destroyed the myth that underdevelopment and democracy cannot coexist. But India, like many developing countries, still faces a major challenge in its efforts to bring healthcare, education and other basic needs to all of its people, so they can live free from the indignity of poverty.

I believe that we still have much to learn from Indira Gandhi today. As Prime Minister, she reached out to India's adversaries. In domestic policy, her heart and mind were always focused on improving the lot of the poor. In pursuing that goal, she understood that energy is development, and development is a debt we owe to each and every human being.

India has built up an impressive indigenous nuclear energy programme since Mrs Gandhi switched on the country's first fully domestically built nuclear power station in Kalpakkam in 1983. I have no doubt that India will continue to make effective use of nuclear and other clean sources of energy to provide electricity to the hundreds of millions who do not have it.

I am delighted at the recent ending of restrictions on India's nuclear trade, which has already opened the door for India to accelerate its use of nuclear power to help meet its energy needs, combat climate change and secure energy independence. I trust that India will spare no effort in practising and advocating the highest standards of nuclear safety and security. In the best tradition of India's human solidarity, I also trust that she will continue to share her technological expertise and economic know-how with developing countries in need.

Having touched upon some of our failures as an international community, and as a human family, I should end by highlighting some of the lessons we need to learn.

First, insecurity anywhere today can easily turn to insecurity everywhere. The organization which I have the honour to lead - the International Atomic Energy Agency - has a mandate which I like to sum up as human security. Our twin goals are not unlike the vision of Indira Gandhi; to try to stop the proliferation of nuclear weapons and move to a world free from nuclear weapons, and to ensure that the benefits of nuclear technology - for power generation, medicine and agriculture - are harnessed for development. Global recognition of the inextricable link between security and development is the only way to break the vicious circle of under-development fuelling insecurity and vice versa.

Second, the threats we face - poverty, war, warped ideologies, environmental degradation, communicable diseases, weapons of mass destruction - are all interconnected and all are "threats without borders," making traditional notions of national security obsolete. By their very nature, these security threats require multinational cooperation and strong international institutions to implement national policies that cannot be implemented by governments acting alone.

Third, festering conflicts can be resolved - look at post-war Europe or, more recently, Northern Ireland. But committed, sustained diplomacy is needed. Solutions to any problem that are not rooted in fairness and justice are not sustainable. Too often, dialogue - the first tool of diplomacy - is perceived as a reward for good behaviour, rather than as a means to change behaviour and reconcile differences.

Ultimately, we need a new global system of collective security that entails an overhaul of the United Nations system and, above all, of the Security Council. A new system in which no country feels the need to rely on nuclear weapons or other inhumane weapons for its security. A new system with effective global mechanisms for conflict prevention, peacekeeping and peacemaking. A new system in which security is not perceived as a zero sum game or based on domination or balance of power, but rather an equitable and inclusive system that enables all of us to live together free from fear and from want. This means that we need a new system that places human security and human solidarity at its core; a system that grasps our shared destiny as one human family.

Indira Gandhi once said: "Minds and attitudes can and must be changed, and injustice and suffering can and must be diminished." Her words are as relevant today as they were then. We need to adjust our moral compass and do what it takes to bring about lasting change. This is key to our survival.

For it is only when every human being lives in peace, freedom and dignity that we will have a world at peace with itself

060. Address by Minister of State Dr Shashi Tharoor at the 'Executive Dinner Forum' on "Doing Business with India - The Next Wave".

Abu Dhabi, October 7, 2009.

Your Highness Sheikh Nahyan bin Mubarak Al-Nahyan,

Your Excellencies,

Respected guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am very pleased to address this distinguished gathering representing leaders of business and finance from the UAE. Your presence here confirms your deep interest in expanding your business ties with India. HH Sheikh Nahyan has made such an outstanding case for doing business with India that I feel almost anything I can say will only be superfluous. Nevertheless, I shall inflict a few thoughts on you to kick start our discussion.

2. India has been a vibrant presence in the political, economic and cultural evolution of the Gulf. For thousands of years, our ancestors sailed the turbulent waters of the Indian Ocean and exchanged goods, ideas and experiences. This interaction over several millennia has left an abiding mark on our civilisational ethos, giving our peoples a similarity of perceptions and cultural mores.

3. This engagement between India and the Gulf has had such sustained resonance primarily because our engagements have been continuously refreshed and revitalized by meeting new needs and requirements. For several centuries, India provided the necessities, comforts and luxuries needed by the people of the Gulf and occasionally re-exported by them to other markets. Indian foodstuffs, textiles and jewellery constituted the main exports from our country, while we imported huge quantities of dates and pearls from here.

4. Later, in recent years, when this region took up the massive expansion of its infrastructure and welfare institutions, India came forward with its human resources, initially blue-collar but increasingly progressing to professionals. Today, there is no aspect of the UAE economy which has not been touched by an Indian contribution.

5. Even as the Gulf economies have expanded to meet modern-day needs, India too has gone through remarkable changes. Perhaps change in India has been less dramatic as compared to the Gulf, which is natural given our size and the number of our people. Nevertheless, India, over the last sixty years, has changed beyond recognition, so that today every aspect of our national life is different from what it was at the dawn of independence. The most remarkable change has been in the lives of the poorest of our people. We are now today able to feed all our people thanks to the three revolutions i.e the green revolution for food production, the white revolution in dairy products and the blue revolution in milk. We are striving to ensure that our peoples have access to the best possible education and the opportunity to live a life of dignity and achievement. We recognize that we still have a long way to go, but we remain confident that we are on the right path.

6. India's success has been noted by a number of international economic commentators at least some of whom have forecast an extraordinary future for the Indian story. Thus, Goldman Sachs, in its report of October 2003, stated that:

- India's growth will exceed 5% per year over the next 30-50 years, making India the world's third largest economy (after USA and China) in 30 years.
- In GDP terms, India will overtake Italy in 2015, France in 2020, Germany in 2025 and Japan in 2030.

Three years later, in January 2007, it painted an even more rosy a picture when it stated:

- India can sustain output growth of about 8% per year till 2020, thus overtaking G-8 countries faster than envisaged earlier.
- India could surpass the USA before 2050, thus becoming the world's second largest economy.

7. Of course the global economy has witnessed a course correction in the last 12 months, but the reasons for Goldman's optimism have not been altered. [ Minister made remarks about the mobile telephone revolution in India touching the lives of the ordinary people of India].

8. I have spoken of significant changes in our national life but what has not changed are certain principles which have given an enduring resilience to our body politic. These are our democratic and secular order and our commitment to social and economic justice, which are enshrined in our Constitution. Thus, the social and economic transformation in India has taken place within the framework of our abiding commitment to these core values, which has enabled us to weather some of the most serious difficulties, political and economic, that have periodically challenged our national fibre and even tested our nationhood.

9. I would like to say a few words about how we have coped with the current global economic crisis. It is a matter of some satisfaction that India's gross domestic product (GDP) grew around 6% in every quarter of what has been described by economists as "the most difficult 12-months in recent history". As against this, most countries in the world suffered falls in growth rates in at least one quarter.

10. Many reasons have been attributed for this success. First, our banks and financial institutions were not tempted to buy mortgage-supported securities and credit default swaps that, in many cases became toxic and ruined several Western financial institutions. Second, though our merchandise exports did register declines of about 30 per cent, our services exports continued to do well.

11. Third, remittances from our overseas Indian community remained robust, reaching $46.4 billion in 2008-09, the bulk of which came from the Indian expatriate community in the Gulf. And, fourth, foreign direct investment has remained substantial, reaching $27.3 billion in 2008-09 in spite of the global financial crisis.

12. Besides these developments, our financial authorities have pursued policies providing for lower interest rates, expanded credit and lower excise duties, all of which have served to boost economic activity. And some 80% of our GDP does not come from the external sector but from producing goods and services for Indians in India.

13. It may be recalled that, at the commencement of the financial crisis in September 2008, foreign investors withdrew $12 billion from our stock markets; they are now flooding back to our exchanges, reaching a rate of $ one billion per week in May 2009.

14. It is in this economic scenario that I now seek a more substantial participation from the Gulf in the extraordinary adventure that is our economic and social development in what the sub-title of this Executive Dinner describes as the "Next Wave".

15. Now, in this "Next Wave" we plan to carry our nation forward on the basis of massive investments in our infrastructure, energy and industrial sectors, along with investments in our human resources through up-gradation of our institutions of primary education and higher learning. We also propose to increase our electric power production by 700% by 2043. It is in this context that India extends to all of you here a hand of partnership, and invites you to participate with us in the new phase of development and prosperity on which we have embarked.

16. We have taken a few practical steps to improve the environment for investments: - a one stop shop; greater involvement of business associations such as CII, ASSOCHAM and FICCI; formation of the Investment Advisory Council to address the problems faced by investors. I would also advice investors to explore the Joint Venture (JV) route to achieve success in India. Further, Indian states compete with each other to attract investments. Foreign investors should be conscious of the differences between states and incentives offered by different states to attract investments.

17. The Gulf region and the UAE are rich in financial resources and in technological capabilities and expertise that have emerged over the last 40 years of extraordinary all-round development. The UAE as a country and the GCC as an economic grouping are already India's number one trade partners. India's trade with UAE touched US$ 44.5 bn last year and with the GCC it was US$ 87 bn. We now see the UAE and the GCC as our premier investment partners as well, so that we can, through our joint effort, build up the projects and institutions that will transform the face of India. I see this as an "extraordinary adventure" since, before our eyes, we will see the most significant transformations in our geographical landscape and in the quality of life of our people.

18. Given the long history of our fruitful interaction, this new engagement to which I have invited you is but one more step in the mutually beneficial relationship that has bonded our people over several millennia, but it promises, in its implications, to be more extraordinarily transformational and fruitful than any interaction that has gone before.

Thank you.

061. Interview of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao with Senior Journalist Kalyani Shankar for All India Radio.

New Delhi, October 16, 2009.

KS: Mrs. Nirupama Rao, you had been the Indian Ambassador to China before you took over as Foreign Secretary. You are fully aware of the Indo-China policy, the Sino-Indian policy also. Do you think the Chinese protest, it is on account of the huge turnout in the Assembly elections or there are other significant things like Pakistan Prime Minister Gilani is visiting Beijing? There have also been reports of a Chinese incursion in the last few months. And also the controversy about China issuing Visa papers to Kashmiris.

Foreign Secretary (FS): We take a long term perspective in our relations with China. China is our largest neighbour. We share a very long boundary with China. There are outstanding issues relating to this boundary which are yet to be resolved. And, therefore, the whole issue that you referred to and the Chinese protests that have been made should be seen in the context of the unresolved boundary question between the two countries. We are very intensively focused on this issue. But at the same time, one must understand that the relationship with China has also been developed in many other areas.

And that development of relations and the concomitant build up of good communication and better understanding between the governments of the two countries and indeed also the academic institutions, the business and industry circles, better connectivity, all this has happened in the last twenty years. So this is what, well, in terms of bringing the two countries into a better mode of communication with each other. As far as boundary between the two countries is concerned, there is still a lot of ground that we have to cover in terms of narrowing differences and building more understanding. But progress in this regard is being made, albeit slowly but it is being made surely. We have the mechanism of the special representatives appointed by the two governments to look into these issues and they have held thirteen rounds of discussions so far. So, as far as the boundary question is concerned, even as we have had these reports of protests and the incursions, one must understand also that there is a situation in which both our countries are placed at the moment and that situation is this focus on trying to resolve the boundary question peacefully.

And on that I believe, I can say it with all honesty, both governments are convinced that there is no other way to resolve this without dialogue. One has to resolve it through dialogue. I remember our first late Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, speaking to Parliament in 1962 saying "we cannot march to Peking" and I am quoting his words. But whatever it is, we must take a realistic view that there are differences, there are differences when it comes to perceiving the line of actual control in the border areas. And there are differences also in terms of conflicting territorial claims. So this is a very complex issue. It is one of the most complicated boundary questions that exist anywhere in the world. But I think it is a good development and it is a positive factor that both countries are determined to resolve these issues.

KS: Do you think in the next round of discussions between the two special representatives, this incursions will be taken up and also about this Arunachal issue will come up because it is again referring to the border?.

FS: In fact, the focus that has been given to both the incursions and also to the Arunachal Pradesh issue, only I think intensifies the need for the two sides to really sit down to resolve these issues with even more seriousness and determination. Because, I think, both governments understand that a peaceful relationship between India and China is not only good for the two countries but it is good for this region, it is good globally also. Just look at the number of issues on which we can cooperate, we are cooperating whether it comes to the Doha Development round, whether it comes to climate change issues, whether it comes to cooperation in multilateral fora, in the reform of the international financial system in the wake of the global economic crisis. There are many many other issues in the relationship where we have common ground where there is a meeting of minds, so I think, we must look at this whole relationship in the larger perspective.

KS: But is the government taking it very seriously, I mean what has been said about Prime Minister's visit. As you said earlier rightly that this is not the first time they have protested. They have protested earlier also.

FS. Of course we take this seriously, and we have been very very particular and very clear and unambivalent in expressing our position to the Chinese. In that way we have said that Arunachal Pradesh is an integral part of India, it is an inalienable part of India.

KS: Mrs. Rao, will there be any change about Dalai Lama visiting Arunachal next month? He is supposed to go there and, I think, Indian government has put a condition that he should not talk anything political and Chinese are objecting to this also?

FS: Well, we regard and we have always said this clearly and also to China that His Holiness Dalai Lama is a spiritual figure, he is a religious figure and he does not indulge in political activities on Indian soil and he is our guest in India and he is free to visit any part of our country.

KS: Mrs. Rao, the Chinese Foreign Minister is due to visit India shortly for the Russia-China-India trilateral. What issues will be discussed in this meeting and also at what level will our Foreign Minister be raising these points?

FS: Kalyani this is a trilateral meeting of the Foreign Ministers, India-Russia-China trilateral. This is the structure that the three countries have devised and this enables us to discuss issues of regional importance and of course, our External Affairs Minister will be meeting his Chinese counterpart during this meeting and this meeting will afford us the opportunity to touch upon various issues of mutual concern and mutual interest in the bilateral relationship, but you must understand that the larger context of this meeting is trilateral. But, there will be bilateral meetings and of course, it goes without saying that whenever we have the opportunity to meet between the two countries, as we would on this occasion, the opportunity does arise for us to raise all issues including issues of concern because it is through discussion, through frank discussion and through open discussion and through discussion at that level, we can remove misunderstandings.

KS: What is going to be the agenda of the trilateral meeting?

FS: The agenda of the trilateral meeting will basically be as I said, discussion of the regional situation, discussion of the opportunities that arise to strengthen dialogue between the three of our countries which are major powers in this region and to look at energy security, to look at issues like better connectivity, issues like dialogue between the academic institutions, the think tanks of the three countries, to look at business and industry relations. So there is a whole gamut of issues that would be discussed.

KS: It would be a long agenda indeed. We have problems with Pakistan also. So now the two Foreign Secretaries were supposed to meet in New York last month.

FS : They did meet.

KS : Then after that what is the progress?

FS : Well, during these meetings, we have had useful meeting with the Pakistani Foreign Secretary and our External Affairs Minister with his Pakistani counterpart. They were useful meetings that were held in New York last month. And during these meetings we were able to communicate to the Pakistani side that while Pakistan is our neighbour and that we have always understood that it is only through dialogue that we can normalize relations between the two countries and build more satisfying degree of understanding between the two countries. It is very essential and we were communicating this to the Pakistani side on behalf of the Government of India and also on behalf of the people of India that the threat and the effect of terrorism which has been directed against the people of India from Pakistani soil by groups, by institutions, by individuals that operate with impunity from Pakistani soil, is the cause of utmost concern for us, because we have been victims of terrorism.

And for a meaningful dialogue to be transacted between the two countries, between the governments, between the institutions of the two countries it is essential that Pakistan addresses this threat of terrorism seriously and meaningfully and effectively. And this is particularly so in the context of the investigations into the Mumbai terror attacks. A little more than a month from now, it will be one year and in Pakistan the trial of those accused and also the investigation into Hafeez Sayed and still we have not had satisfaction on that as yet from the Pakistan side. And we continue to emphasise this to the Pakistani authorities that it is essential that they move resolutely and meaningfully and they take action against these individuals because it is only through that process that we will see an end to these problems.

KS: We have been saying this that the culprits should be brought to book, we have been insisting again and again. We have been saying that there will be no composite dialogue, but still there is not much of forward movement. They only go ahead with whatever they are saying, nothing more than this. They say no credible evidence. We have given evidence, still it is not satisfactory.

FS: Well, we should not, in my view, let down our guard on this issue and that I feel very very strongly that we must continue to emphasise our concerns to Pakistan because what we are saying is for the good of Pakistan also. You see the effect of terrorism in Pakistan also, so I think it is time that Pakistan understood the danger, the clear and present danger that exists from terrorism. We are the voice of sanity, the Indian Government and the Indian people, and I think Pakistan must come round to understanding the sincerity and the seriousness that we attach to this.

KS: Well, we talk of Pakistan, but I want to move forward to Afghanistan where our embassy has been attacked recently and it was done earlier also. So, where it is going to lead us?

FS: Again, the attacks on our embassy in Kabul last week and the attack last July 2008 have also brought home, not only to us in this region, but also to the international community, the threat and danger that exists from terrorism. The unhindered way in which terrorist groups have been allowed to operate in this region and we must understand that there is very very great urgent immediate need for the international community to be one on tackling this threat. And what has happened in Afghanistan, we are in Afghanistan to help the people of Afghanistan. Our development partnership with Afghanistan has won us hearts and minds in Afghanistan and there is no doubt about it. I went to Afghanistan myself and had the opportunity to meet President Karzai, Foreign Minister and National Security Adviser, Dr. Rasool.

All of them were unanimous in their appreciation of the role that India is playing in Afghanistan to help the Afghan people. We have no other agenda in Afghanistan, we are there to help.

KS: But Pakistan should realize this.

FS : Of course, it is essential that Pakistan realizes this and Pakistan understands that we are there for legitimate reasons, we are there to help the people of Afghanistan.

KS : Well, the next big thing for India is the Prime Minister's visit to Washington next month. I think this is the first State visit Mr. Obama US President will have after he has taken over. What is going to be the agenda between the two leaders.

FS : Well, we have a global partnership with the United States. As President Obama said recently to our Prime Minister "there are new well springs of cooperation in this relationship. When Ms. Hillary Clinton, the Secretary of State was here in July, we announced this new dialogue architecture between the two countries and the pillars not only concern strategic issues or security issues, they also concern human development issues, issues like agriculture, energy, cooperation in energy, gender empowerment, the environment, the education issues, there are many many pillars to this dialogue today. The visit of our Prime Minister to Washington will enable us to take this dialogue forward and it will strengthen and consolidate our partnership with the government and with the people of the United States.

KS: You were the High Commissioner to Sri Lanka earlier and right now the leaders from Tamil Nadu, and all parties for that matter, they are making noise about the treatment of the Tamil fishermen. What is your comment about this?

FS: We are in constant touch with the Sri Lankan authorities. Whenever there are cases of our fishermen, unwittingly or inadvertently, straying into Sri Lankan waters and if they are apprehended by the Sri Lankan side, we take immediate steps to secure their release and take up their case with the Sri Lankan authorities.

KS: What about the ethnic Tamils and their rehabilitation?

FS : Well, as you know, we have announced a package a Rs.500 crores of assistance to help the ethnic Tamils because then they can return to their homes and resume their livelihood.

KS: Thank you very much for being with us Mrs. Rao.

062. Excerpts from the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's speech at the Combined Commanders' Conference.

New Delhi, October 20, 2009.

On behalf of the Nation, I commend the Armed Forces for their devotion to duty in safeguarding our country's unity and integrity. Our country is proud of our men and women in uniform, and is indebted to them for their defence of our borders on the land, sea and air.

During the past year, the Armed Forces have played a stellar role in assisting civil authority in meeting the challenges in Jammu and Kashmir and tackling the insurgencies in the North-East. You have rendered invaluable service during natural calamities, including in the recent flood relief operations. Your sacrifice, courage and bravery are a source of inspiration, and an example, for the entire country.

There have been momentous developments in our country and in the international arena since I last addressed this Conference. The country successfully held its fifteenth general election this year. This was the largest democratic exercise the world has ever seen, and is a tribute to the strength of our institutions. We have matured as a democratic, pluralistic and secular society and this is a matter of justifiable pride for every Indian.

The Nation also witnessed the horrific terrorist attack on Mumbai, and we will be observing its first anniversary in a few weeks from now. The Mumbai attack confirmed our worst fears about the lethal dimensions of terrorism and non-traditional threats to our security.

There are both State and non-State actors involved in the business of terrorism. India is a democracy and an open society and is, therefore, sometimes highly vulnerable. We have, therefore, to improve our defensive mechanisms against all forms of terrorism, asymmetric warfare and aggravated militancy. We need to be prepared to face onslaughts of this kind, but we should avoid kneejerk reactions.

The Government has taken several steps to strengthen the intelligence and security machinery and coordination between the Centre and the States.

Although there has been no major terrorist attack in India since then, there are regular intelligence reports of imminent attacks in the country. This is a matter of deep concern, and there is no room for complacency.

The terrorist attack on our Embassy in Kabul on October 8 is yet another grim reminder of the forces we are pitted against.

The overall situation in our immediate neighbourhood has worsened since I last spoke to you.

Beyond such an environment in our periphery, we face other challenges. The global economic and financial crisis has affected our growth, our exports, and the inflow of the foreign investment into India. The drought in several States has further impacted the most vulnerable sections of our society during the current year. There are incipient signs of recovery in the global economy, but it is not yet certain whether this represents a return to a secular and self-sustaining growth path. Despite these negative factors, the Indian economy has shown remarkable resilience. Our growth rate in the current year will be 6 - 6.5 percent. We are today the second fastest growing economy in the world.

Global efforts to combat climate change have rightly gathered momentum. However, there are concerted attempts by the developed countries to impose new obligations on developing countries like India to limit emission of greenhouse gases. This could impact on our economic development.

Food security and energy security are central to our development goals. Given our vast demands, we have to ensure that our interests are adequately protected in all international discussions on these issues.

There is a revival of interest on nuclear disarmament and non-proliferation issues. We welcome this, because India was a pioneer in the campaign for a nuclear weapons free world. We, however, have to ensure that discriminatory standards and approaches are not perpetuated. As a responsible nuclear weapon state, we wish to see nuclear disarmament that is global, non-discriminatory and universal in nature. We are ready to negotiate a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty which is multilateral, non-discriminatory and verifiable.

To meet these different challenges we must be strong internally. We cannot rely on others to solve our problems for us. This requires a well thought national response and judicious policy prescriptions. It also means creative and constructive engagement with the outside world based on enlightened self-interest, and autonomy in the processes of decision making.

In a short span of one year, the G-20 process has become the most visible sign of the emerging multipolarity in world affairs. India's views in this forum are heard with respect. We have been able to bring the issues of concern to us on the mainstream international agenda. India is now seen as a part of the solution to overcome the global economic slowdown, and a growth pole of the world economy.

The Armed Forces must be fully equipped to deal with all threat scenarios. Our troops should be trained to fight anywhere, anytime and under any conditions. Their ability to deal with non-traditional threats must receive greater attention.

Our Government is fully committed to the modernization of Armed Forces and ensuring their military superiority and technological edge. The modernization plan should have a long term perspective, and be formulated in an integrated manner involving all the three services. Despite the progress that has been made towards jointness and synergy in various operational, training and administrative aspects between the services, there are a number of areas of congruence that need to be strengthened further.

The availability of critical technologies from foreign countries is still subject to various technology denial regimes. It is therefore vital that we achieve maximum self-reliance in the critical areas of defence technology.

I would like to compliment the Defence Research and Development Organisation for the work it has done against many odds. Today, Indian industry is in a position to participate in defence production and research and development activities, and we should devise policies to harness this vast pool of knowledge and resources efficiently.

I am aware that the procedures for defence acquisitions and procurement are a matter of concern to the Armed Forces. This is an area which requires collective action on all sides. We must ensure a balance between the needs of timely modernization and the necessity of conforming to the highest standards of transparency, probity and public accountability. Outlays on defence expenditure have progressively gone up, but they also have to be used judiciously and efficiently.

Manpower is the most important resource for war fighting. We will take all measures necessary to ensure that the Armed Forces continue to attract the brightest and the best of our youth. As senior Commanders, it should be your endeavour to ensure that these men and women constantly upgrade their skills and remain ahead of the technology curve. This will not only make them better soldiers, but also more productive citizens on the completion of their service.

I am heartened by the growing social awareness of the need to ensure the welfare of ex-servicemen. The resettlement and rehabilitation of ex-servicemen will continue to remain a high priority for the government.

The Indian Armed Forces have earned high respect for their professionalism and competence throughout the world. This is in no small measure due to the personal leadership each one of you has provided to the men and women in uniform. The Nation is united in its resolve to ensure that our military remains a modern, well-knit and invincible fighting force.

Jai Hind.

063. Speech by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on the occasion of the Inaugural Haj Flight.

New Delhi, October 20, 2009.

Hon'ble Chief Minister of Delhi Smt. Sheila Dixit,

Hon'ble Shri Raj Kumar Chauhan, Hon'ble Minister of Revenue and Haj Affairs, Delhi Government

Hon'ble Shri Harun Yusuf, Minister of Food & Civil Supplies, Delhi Government & Acting Chairman of Delhi State Haj Committee,

Shri N. Ravi, Secretary (East),

H.E. The Ambassador of Saudi Arabia to India,

Senior Officials,

Brothers and sisters,

On behalf of the Government of India and on my own behalf, it gives me great pleasure to greet and convey my best wishes to all the pilgrims who are embarking upon the pious journey for performing the Haj. The time for accomplishment of your life-cherished dream of performing Haj and for you to be able to pay respects at the Holy Mosque has arrived. Haj is a precious gift from the Almighty Allah and is a privilege for which a believer yearns throughout his life. Undoubtedly, all of you are fortunate whom the Almighty Allah has accepted as his guest and permitted you to visit His House.

2. Government of India attaches the highest importance to the fulfillment of the religious obligations of the Indian Muslims and pays close attention to the arrangements made in India and Saudi Arabia to facilitate their sacred pilgrimage. Ministry of External Affairs, in coordination with the Ministry of Civil Aviation, our Missions in Saudi Arabia, other agencies of the Government of India, the Haj Committee of India and the State Haj Committees have been working to take all necessary measures to provide and improve facilities and services for the pilgrims in Jeddah, Makkah Mukarramah, Madina Munawwarah and Mina/Arafat areas.

3. With this aim, senior officials from the Ministry of External Affairs and the Ministry of Civil Aviation and Air India along with Members of Haj

Committee of India, have visited Saudi Arabia from time to time this year and had held extensive discussions with Saudi Arabian authorities and Saudi Arabian Airlines about various issues concerning our pilgrims.

4. During Haj 2009, about 115,000 pilgrims going through Haj Committee of India are being transported through Saudi Arabian Airlines and Air India through 19 embarkation points. I am happy to note that Mangalore and Ranchi have been added as new embarkation points from this year, in addition to the existing embarkation points. In addition, 45000 pilgrims will be going through the private tour operators.

5. A significant aspect of the arrangements for Indian pilgrims for Haj 2009 is the enhanced use of Information Technology through total computerization of pilgrim location and movement including all those who are going through private tour operators. Relatives sitting in India can now find out, through the website of the Haj Committee of India (www.hajcommittee.com), the whereabouts of their relatives performing Haj and can communicate with them during their stay in Saudi Arabia. I sincerely hope that all of you have attended the orientation/Training of pilgrims programme, which is very important to understand Haj rituals and arrangements being made for the pilgrims. I am told that a copy of the Haj Guide has also been made available to you by the Haj Committee. The Haj Guide gives a comprehensive description of the Haj rituals and details about the arrangements made in Saudi Arabia.

6. The coverage of Cash Loss and Baggage Loss cases under Accident Compensation Scheme, which was introduced during Haj 2004 continues and has been further expanded. Haj Committee has also continued with the system of issuance of foreign exchange amount in Saudi Riyals in cash to the pilgrims at all the embarkation points in India itself.

7. As you are aware, this year we had some major challenges like the issue of international passport to all pilgrims and the bigger challenge of prevention of Swine Flu. We have taken adequate measures to address these issue. Our Medical Mission in Saudi Arabia has been fully geared up to address any health related requirement and will be working closely with the State health authorities.

8. Indian Embassy in Riyadh and Consulate General of India, Jeddah have been entrusted with the responsibility of the arrangements made for the Indian pilgrims in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. In case of any difficulty during your stay in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, the pilgrims are requested to approach the officials of the Indian Embassy/Indian Consulate who shall be available in Jeddah, Makkah Mukarramah, Madina Munawwarah and also at centers established at Mina/Arafat during the entire Haj period. The Government of India has also deputed about 300 Khadimul Hujjaj and more than 600 administrative and medical staff to provide and ensure maximum comfort to our pilgrims.

9. Please remember you are the representatives of India and so carry the best wishes of Indians to your hosts and Saudi brothers & sisters. During this spiritual and religious journey of Haj, I would urge you to kindly demonstrate exemplary patience, particularly at the rituals in Jamarat, to be careful about your own security and that of your companions in the huge congregation. From the time you leave for Haj pilgrimage till the time you return to your home, you are on the holy path. Your patience and forbearance would definitely prove rewarding. I would also request you to pray for the welfare, peace and prosperity of our country.

10. Once again, on behalf of the Government of India and on my personal behalf, I offer my heartiest greetings to all of you and I extend my best wishes for a very successful Haj. May Almighty Allah reward you with a perfectly accomplished Haj. (Ameen).

Thank you, Jai Hind.

064. Inaugural Address of Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the Second International Conference on "Terrorism - National and International".

New Delhi, October 27, 2009.

It gives me great pleasure to inaugurate the Second International Conference on Terrorism organized by the Jama Masjid United Forum.

The Forum's effort to promote inter-faith understanding and confront national challenges and social evils through its awareness programmes is commendable. The Resolution adopted by the first conference last year was significant in urging that "all methods of non-violence should ... be exhausted to change the psyche of a terrorist." It condemned "all acts of racial profiling and abuse of basic human rights" and urged that acts of terrorism, or of individual terrorists, should not be categorised "knowingly or unknowingly" in community terms.

Terrorism is understood to be any act "intended to cause death or serious bodily harm to civilians or non-combatants with the purpose of intimidating a population or compelling a government or an international organization to do or abstain from doing any act".

The pedigree of terrorism in modern times can be traced to the policies of the colonialists. The label of 'terrorist' was liberally used by the British against Indians, Burmese and Malays and by the French against the Algerians. More or less every movement in the modern era had been labeled 'terrorist' by different parties - whether it was the Jewish Underground in Mandate Palestine, the ANC in South Africa or various Palestinian groups.

It is not thus of recent origin but globalization and technology has now made it trans-national in reach and devastating in its impact. It has surfaced in most parts of the world and is not country, region or community specific. It has been resorted to by the oppressed as well as the oppressors. It is disruptive of normal life and its principal targets are innocent bystanders.

For this reason alone, it is cowardly, unethical and immoral. It cannot be, and has not been, condoned in any belief system and yet at different points of time, adherents of various religions have been labeled as terrorists. Those trying to locate the origin of terrorism in Islam or in any other faith display ignorance of history or downright prejudice.

The human and political context of the phenomenon nevertheless needs to be explored. The religious commandments of right and wrong have been supplemented in the modern era with precepts and instruments of international and national law and the elements of what constitute the inalienable rights of humans, irrespective of nationality, race, religion or class. The steps taken so far by individual states and the international community are essentially preventive or punitive, aimed at dismantling the infrastructure of terrorism, and do not deal sufficiently with the mental orientation that leads to terrorist acts. The latter emanate from a radicalization of the mind propelled by perceived grievances and sought to be anchored on ideology or faith. Combating terrorism thus becomes a sociological, psychological and political effort as much as a security one; the corrective effort on each of these needs to begin simultaneously rather than sequentially.

No human society has attained perfection. Shortcomings and grievances do exist, sometimes in aggravated forms that outrage human sensibility. The allure of a response through "resistance" and "revolution" that political extremists and religious fundamentalists peddle in our times has been facilitated by mobility and communications. The call for extremism and resort to mindless violence is an easier alternative to political struggle and the painstaking path of empowering common people through education and by patiently and peacefully mobilizing them for their chosen cause. This is particularly so in open societies where correctives can be sought through peaceful and democratic means.

By the same logic, societies must address grievances in a timely manner and not seek to avoid them on specious considerations of law, procedures or traditions. The solution lies in according equality of status and opportunity and socio-economic and political justice to all through a system of democratic and responsible governance. Laws must be equitable and must be applied fairly.

It is also important to remember that those advocating extremist, fundamentalist and terrorist causes constitute a tiny minority. They neither have the religious nor political mandate for their abhorrent actions and ideologies. A majority of humanity is too poor and is focused on trying to survive. Their vulnerability lies in their poverty; it is this that provides an opportunity to peddlers of extremism. This opportunity gets fructified only because those tasked with political governance and religious and moral leadership have failed.

Initiatives such as this Conference by the Jama Masjid United Forum would contribute to better understanding of the phenomenon of terrorism and means of tackling it, both nationally and internationally.

I thank Syed Yahya Bukhari saheb for inviting me today. I wish the deliberations of this Conference all success."

065. Speech by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor greeting the Haj pilgrims at Kozhikode embarkation point for the Haj flight.

Kazhikode (Kerala), October 29, 2009.

Hon'ble Chief Minister,

Hon'ble Chairman, Kerala State Haj Committee,

Dignitaries,

Senior Officials and

Dear brothers & sisters,

As the Minister of State for External Affairs in charge of Haj matters, it gives me great pleasure to greet and convey my best wishes to all of you who are undertaking the pious journey of performing the Haj, and to pay respects at the Holy Mosque at Madinah of Prophet Mohammed (Peace Be Upon Him). Haj is an incomparable and unparallel gift from Allah Almighty. Only the most fortunate of persons get the opportunity provided by the Almighty Allah to visit His Holy Abode.

2. The Government of India is fully committed to ensure that the best possible arrangements are put in place in India and Saudi Arabia for the comfort and well being of Indian pilgrims to facilitate their sacred pilgrimage. Ministry of External Affairs, in coordination with the Ministry of Civil Aviation, our Missions in Saudi Arabia, other agencies of the Government of India, the Haj Committee of India and the State Haj Committees have been working to take all necessary measures to provide and improve services for the pilgrims in Jeddah, Makkah Mukarramah, Madina Munawwarah and Mina/Arafat areas.

3. It is a matter of great pride for us that one of the largest contingents of Haj pilgrims in the world goes from our country. This year around 160,000 pilgrims would visit Saudi Arabia for Haj. Out of this 1,15,000 pilgrims are going through Haj Committee of India and 45,000 Indian pilgrims would be performing Haj through the private tour operators.

4. The Government has taken a number of decisions to streamline the functioning of Private Tour Operators so that they provide proper services and facilities for the pilgrims. It is a matter of satisfaction that over the years the Indian Private Tour Operators have been contributing significantly in providing necessary services to the Indian pilgrims. These pilgrims also benefit from the arrangements, for medical and general assistance, put in place by the Haj Mission in Jeddah. As in the past year, Private Tour Operators would provide coverage under the Accident Compensation Scheme to pilgrims being taken by them.

5. I sincerely hope that all of you have attended the orientation/training programmes meant for pilgrims. These are very important to understand Haj rituals and arrangements being made for the pilgrims. In case some of you have missed attending this training, please do take guidance about Haj rituals from your fellow-beings. I am told that a copy of the Haj Guide has also been made available to you by the Haj Committee. The Haj Guide gives a comprehensive description of the Haj rituals and details about the arrangements made in Saudi Arabia.

6. I would like to assure you all that the Government's objective is to bring about constant improvements and innovations in our Haj Management, both in India as well in Saudi Arabia. Our Missions in Riyadh and Jeddah are fully geared up for the forthcoming Haj and working hard to fulfill its mandate of serving the Hajjis and taking care of their needs and requirements during their stay in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. In case of any difficulty during the stay in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, the pilgrims may kindly approach the officers/officials of the Indian Embassy/ Indian Consulate who shall be available in Jeddah, Makkah Mukarramah, Madina Munawwarah and also at centers established at Mina/Arafat during Haj period. The Government of India is also deputing about 300 Khadimul Hujjaj and more than 500 administrative and medical staff to ensure maximum comfort to the Indian pilgrims.

7. The Government would continue to provide the necessary infrastructure for the efficient management of Haj. The Government is also deputing sufficient number of doctors, paramedics and administrative staff to Jeddah to look after and assist the Indian pilgrims during their stay in Saudi Arabia. Sufficient medicines and other critical medical equipment would also be made available to our doctors for helping the Indian pilgrims. The Government has also made arrangements in India for polio, meningitis and influenza vaccinations for the pilgrims and arrangements for swine flu medicines are being made. From the time you leave for Haj pilgrimage till the time you return to your home, you are on the path leading to Allah. Your patience and forbearance would definitely prove rewarding. I would also request you to pray for the welfare, peace and prosperity of our country.

8. Once again, on behalf of the Government of India and on my personal behalf, I offer my heartiest greetings to all of you and I extend my best wishes for a very successful Haj. May Almighty Allah reward you with a perfectly accomplished Haj (Ameen).

Thank you, Jai Hind.

066. Valedictory Address by Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the Indian Army-Claws International Seminar on 'Changing Nature of Conflict: Trends and Responses'.

New Delhi, November 24, 2009.

Good Afternoon Ladies and Gentlemen. It is indeed a pleasure to be addressing this august gathering of eminent scholars and policy makers. I am sorry not to have been able to follow your discussions over the last two days on what must rank as one of the most interesting contemporary issues facing the international strategic community. I commend the Centre for Land Warfare Studies and the Army HQ for organizing this topical and exceptionally relevant seminar.

2. I consider it a privilege to deliver the valedictory address at this important and timely international seminar on the 'Changing Nature of Conflict: Trends and Responses'. The event reflects the growing realization that we have to adapt to the changing regional and international environment and prepare ourselves well to meet emerging threats and challenges in consonance with the changing nature of conflict.

3. As you have deliberated over the past two days, there is a paradigm shift taking place in the nature of conflict. Geography is no more a constraint for those who wish to perpetuate violence. As 9/11 so graphically demonstrated, violence too has been globalized. At the same time, most conflicts are now internal. Sub-conventional conflicts, characterized by intra-state strife, have gained ascendancy over traditional conflicts, which used to be mostly conventional inter-state wars. The easy availability of cheap, mass-produced small arms, landmines and IEDs has exponentially increased the ability of aggrieved groups to orchestrate violence within societies. Socio-economic, ethnic, religious and environmental factors have come to the fore as major sources of threats to both state and human security than ever before. Many of them have transformed into what can be called 'problems without passports' - like terrorism, drug-trafficking, small arms proliferation, illegal migration and refugees. The transnational nature of these threats and the increasing involvement of state actors in using sub-conventional conflicts as 'war by other means' have exacerbated their complexity. At the same time, as long as unresolved disputes pertaining to territory, water or any other natural resources remain, the dangers of outbreak of inter-state conflicts, employing (at the lowest rung of escalation) 'proxy wars' and (at the highest) actual war, continue to exist.

4. India is situated in one of the most volatile regions. Some of the world's most unstable states are in our neighbourhood. It would not be an exaggeration to say that our country is an 'island of stability' in a churning sea. Pakistan and Afghanistan have become epicentres of terrorism, which of late has become the single most dominant national security concern for India. The presence of weapons of mass destruction and the danger of their falling into the hands of terrorists is yet another cause for concern. The internal political situations in Bangladesh, Nepal and Myanmar have taken a turn for the better in recent months but continue to be unpredictable. Sri Lanka is still in the process of settling down politically after the Government's military victory over the LTTE. It will take a long time for these countries to stabilize themselves in real terms. Therefore, external threats to India's national security continue to abound. India is committed to peace and stability in its neighbourhood. It has always sought to reach out to its neighbours, near and far, in building strong relations and partnerships. India profoundly believes that it is in our strategic national interest that South Asia is peaceful and prosperous on a sustainable basis. Our progress as a successful and secure regional power depends largely on regional stability and a favourable security environment.

5. Threats are becoming increasingly difficult to predict in the prevailing era of strategic uncertainty. Quite often there is a 'grey area' where political motivations coincide with criminal intent and activities. Some of our likely adversaries are characterized by their invisible, amorphous, diverse, global, lethal and fanatic nature. To tackle these threats India must employ its diplomatic, economic and military prowess in full.

6. Conflicts are inhuman; "new conflicts" are even more cruel. Therefore, while addressing these conflicts, it is vital that governments have to be doubly conscious of human rights and humanitarian law that is built on two fundamental concepts: the separation of combatants from civilians and the doctrine of proportionality in the use of force. Many of the recent civil wars have featured direct and deliberate assaults on civilians. Often, in these conflicts, victimizing civilians is a war aim of the combatants. And then there is terrorism, which violates all tenets of international humanitarian law. But nation-states must give primacy to protection of their people, especially of women and children. It is, in fact, the very idea of upholding basic human rights standards that can help make the world safer. Overlooking this principle will backfire in the long run by causing more conflict and instability. What is also required in responding to the changing nature of conflict is a 'dialogue of cultures' and greater involvement of the civil society. As we have learned in India, the active promotion of pluralism is the best antidote to the risk of sectarian conflict.

7. Given the nature of "new conflicts", 'cooperative security' should be explored as the preferred avenue of approaching conflict resolution and in turn to augment regional and international security. We have to consciously strive to build interdependencies among the countries of South Asia. This, in the long run, will create vested interests in each other's prosperity and stability. South Asia should evolve as the 'most integrated region' in the world. There has to be a smooth flow of goods, services, capital, knowledge, ideas and even people. I acknowledge that these are real challenges for our foreign policy and diplomacy. But, let us strive to convert these aspirations into reality. SAARC, the present regional arrangement, is admirable but has been functioning with some handicaps. The foremost challenge, as rightly identified by Dr. Manmohan Singh, is to "create a stable and cooperative atmosphere" that would allow the countries of South Asia to concentrate their energies on tackling the problems at home and in the region. It is through policies of cooperation that the causes of instability could be minimized. India will also make maximum use of its close cooperation with regional organizations in the vicinity like ASEAN and the Shanghai Cooperation Organization to effectively mitigate the causes and consequences of conflicts in its neighbourhood.

8. At the global level, the United Nations, in responding to conflicts, is gradually moving from, what former Secretary General Kofi Anan termed, a "culture of reaction" to a "culture of prevention". As one who has spent a large portion of my own professional life at the UN, I can confidently say that the world body has enormous potential to act as an intervening agent in today's conflicts. The UN aims to resolve conflicts with out any biases. However, to achieve this potential, the member states have to muster more political will, commit resources and willingly coordinate their activities. After all, the UN, at its best and its worst, is a mirror of the world: it reflects not just our divisions and disagreements but also our hopes and convictions. I believe an effective United Nations is essential as the indispensable global institution at this moment than ever before.

9. On her part, India has to fully exploit her diplomatic resources - bilateral and multilateral - in meeting the challenges posed by the changing nature of conflict by deepening our strategic partnerships with key countries and regions. At the same time, as I have pointed out elsewhere, foreign policy is too important an issue to be left to the Ministry of External Affairs alone. Our society as a whole, and particularly its educated young people, must care enough about India's place in the world to participate actively in shaping our international posture."

10. Having spoken to the organizers of this seminar, I can confidently say that the aim of the seminar - to comprehensively examine the factors influencing the changing nature of conflict so as to arrive at a clear perspective about its emerging contours - has been achieved. I am sure the seminar has made a major contribution to enhancing understanding of the strategic and operational level steps necessary to come to grips with sub-conventional conflict and to transform military and other security forces and decision-making processes to combat emerging threats, challenges and vulnerabilities.

11. I am also glad to be acquainted with the participation of delegates from friendly foreign countries. I do hope that you enjoyed your short stay in India. I once again thank the Indian Army and the Director, CLAWS, for giving me the opportunity to share my views on this important subject.

067. Address by Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs Vayalar Ravi while inaugurating the 4th annual conference of Heads of Indian Missions.

New Delhi, November 26, 2009.

Shri Vayalar Ravi, Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs inaugurated the 4th Annual Conference of Head of Missions of GCC Countries, Libya, Malaysia, Yemen and Maldives here today. Addressing the conference, he said that this conference has emerged as an important platform to understand and find solutions to the problems faced by overseas Indian workers and it reinforces our commitment to strive for their better protection and welfare. He said our workers in the Gulf are temporary, contractual workers and they spend several years in harsh living and working conditions, remit most of their savings back home and often return in poor health and with no savings. This is the frightening prospect that thousands of workers returning from the Gulf. He further said it is necessary that we structure an appropriate programme to ensure a reasonable level of financial security on return and to inculcate the practice of thrift for a secure retirement. Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is working towards establishing a Return and Resettlement Fund that will provide for a contribution based scheme to incentivize the return and resettlement of the overseas worker.

Shri Ravi said that the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is committed to transforming emigration into a simple, efficient, transparent, orderly and humane process. The Ministry is taking legislative and administrative measures to deal firmly with irregular migration. One of the reasons for irregular migration is the nefarious activities of Indian intermediaries operating from the host countries. Our Missions should get after such unscrupulous elements, collect intelligence and share information with the Indian enforcement agencies so that they could be prosecuted under the Indian Law. He informed that the Ministry is considering replacing the existing Emigration Law by a new Law. The Emigration Management Bill 2009 will shortly be placed before the Cabinet, seeking approval for introducing the Bill in the Parliament.

The Minister also informed that the Indian Community Welfare Funds (ICWF) in the 17 ECR countries and in Maldives has been established. The ICWF is a self-financing mechanism for providing need based and means tested support services to emigrants in distress. He added that the key services such as - a toll free help line, a counseling facility, a shelter for runaway housemaids and a facility to extend contingency based legal, medical and emergency relief assistance are major initiatives taken by the Ministry for protection of Overseas Indian workers. He further said that the Ministry has signed MOUs for bilateral cooperation for protection and welfare of overseas Indian workers with Malaysia, Jordan and all the GCC countries except Saudi Arabia. These MOUs will have optimal impact on the conditions of our workers only if the Joint Working Group meetings are held regularly. He said that our Mission in Saudi Arabia and MEA will continue to make efforts to facilitate early negotiations for a MOU with Saudi Arabia. There is a proposal for similar MOUs with Yemen, Libya and Maldives.

068. Keynote Address by the Defence Minister A. K. Antony at the 44th Foundation Day Function of the Institute of Defence Studies and Analysis.

New Delhi, November 27, 2009.

It is a real pleasure to be back amidst you for the 44th Foundation Day of the Institute. The Foundation Day is an occasion for both - reflection and introspection. I congratulate IDSA scholars for doing a good job over the past four-and-a-half decades.

Since our last meeting, the quality and quantity of the work output has been enhanced. The research done at IDSA has been well-received by members of the strategic community for its content, objectivity and analysis. Thanks are also due to my colleagues on the Executive Council for their support for the Institute's agenda for development. I express my thanks to the entire staff of IDSA. However, we cannot afford to be complacent and must continue to work with renewed vigour. We cannot say everything is perfect. There is always room for improvement.

The various commentaries and reports on the website have gained wider acceptance and visibility. The attempt to activate your defence studies programme with the launch of the Journal of Defence Studies and through seminars on topical subjects like defence budget, defence acquisition and civil-military relations, is particularly welcome.

I would like to congratulate the young winners of the IDSA debating Awards for their commendable performance. I once again congratulate you. You all are the future. A rising India needs bright, young thinkers like you. I am confident that participation of youth in debates on national security issues would encourage the youth to seriously pursue studies in related disciplines in the future. At the same time, through you all, I invite youth to join our Armed Forces.

I felicitate Dr Harsh V Pant, the winner of the K Subrahmanyam Award, for his outstanding contribution to the field of strategic studies. I also congratulate Air Commodore Arjun Subramaniam, who has earned an Honourable Mention for his work in defence and security studies. It is gratifying that despite a demanding schedule, a serving Air Force officer has devoted time and energy to pen well-researched articles for prestigious defence journals. I am sure that such recognition would encourage more serving officers to follow suit. We need more officers with a broader vision of the new challenges confronting India's security.

Let me now focus on IDSA and our country's defence and a few other related issues.

India's profile is growing in the international arena. Other nations are expecting more and more from us in meeting some common challenges. We have been making sincere and continuous efforts to resolve long outstanding issues in our region. We have always strived for peaceful relations with all our neighbours. Even with a vibrant democracy and a prospering economy, we cannot ignore the security calculus.

Our Prime Minister's willingness to resume the dialogue with Pakistan must be seen in this context. Pakistan must put an end to terror activities emanating from its soil. However, the terror infrastructure on the ground remains intact - and is actually thriving. Pakistan is yet to demonstrate any will to take speedy action against terrorists and international criminals. We need to closely monitor the developments in Pakistan.

We are hopeful that China will reciprocate the initiatives aimed at mutual trust-building and understanding. The increasing nexus between China and Pakistan in military sphere remains an area of serious concern. We have to carry out continuous appraisals of Chinese military capabilities and shape our responses accordingly. At the same time, we need to be vigilant at all times.

I am tempted to react. As a Defence Minister, I can't react often. As the Defence Minister, I can't support many of his views.

We have taken several steps for enhancing the capacity-building of our Armed Forces to meet new and varied challenges. However, we will remain steadfast in our pursuit of regional and global peace. It is here that a committed pool of strategic thinkers and policy analysts need to undertake quality research. We will need high-quality research papers and studies of on a wide array of subjects to counter information or misinformation campaigns. The role of organisations like IDSA in providing such qualitative inputs to assist policy formulation can never be underestimated.

Over the past couple of years, we have also seen how issues of national security and foreign policy have arrived at the forefront of public debates. As public awareness of such issues grows, the debates will only gain currency. In a vibrant democracy like ours, such debates are both natural and healthy. So I welcome more and more thought-provoking speeches and articles. However, to enhance the quality of these debates, think tanks like IDSA will have to play a far more proactive role by undertaking a thorough research and wide dissemination of their findings. As one of the premier think tanks of the country, IDSA will have to shoulder the responsibility in this regard. You need to constantly ask yourself whether your work is making a significant contribution towards improving the quality of policy debates? As President of IDSA, I am not the judge. The others will have to say that you are doing good work. You also need to deliberate on whether the quality of work is respected by experts.

In this context, I compliment the initiative taken by IDSA last year to produce valuable reports based on studies carried out by Task Forces of in-house scholars and outside experts on such burning issues as Climate Change and Space Security. I understand that similar Task Forces are also working on other issues like Water Security and Nuclear Disarmament. You must aim at an early finalization of these reports for the strategic community, as well as for the public. This is a vital requirement in a democratic polity, where governments have to take policy decisions based on informed opinions and at the same time, take adequate care of the sensitivities and preferences of citizens.

I once again congratulate the IDSA family for the Foundation Day celebrations. I urge all of you to redouble your efforts to fulfil the vision of becoming an Institute of international repute.

069. Address by the Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at Valedictory Dinner for 48th Professional Course for Foreign Diplomats organized by the Foreign Service Institute.

New Delhi, December 3, 2009.

Excellencies

Dean FSI

Participating Diplomats

Distinguished Guests and my dear friends,

I am very happy to deliver this Valedictory Address to the 30 young diplomats from 25 developing countries who have successfully completed the month long 48th Professional Course for Foreign Diplomats (PCFD) organized by Foreign Service Institute of the Ministry of External Affairs of India. I am also happy to note the presence of Heads of Missions and other Senior Diplomats representing the countries of participating diplomats.

2. From the Course Programme and Dean (FSI)'s Welcome Address, I understand that during the Course the participating diplomats were given insightful information and views on a variety of subjects like India's Foreign Policy Priorities, Strategic Planning, Art of Diplomatic Negotiations, Economic Issues, WTO, Climate Change, Communication Skills, and Security Issues by the very distinguished guest faculty of FSI. I am happy to note that the emphasis of this diverse course module was on inculcating a strategic mindset which will prove immensely useful in the discharge of onerous diplomatic duties. I am told the group this time is bright, erudite and smart- these being essential qualities of diplomats. I have also noticed the diversity of the group- 30 representatives from 25 countries - is really impressive sample of international representation.

3. It was fascinating to hear Dean Ajay Choudhry's description of your programme. I am sure that the visits and Study Tour within Delhi and to Agra, Jaipur, Hyderabad, and Goa, must have given a glimpse of the unity in diversity, the hospitality, and the beauty of India to our guests. After visiting places and monuments of historic, cultural, religious, educational and industrial importance, they would have gained deeper knowledge of the progress of India since Independence. Above all, I hope, they understand India and her aspirations better. I am told you visited the rural development project at the Society for Elimination of Rural Poverty which has done pioneering work among 10 million women by empowering them through self help groups. Such initiatives are inspiring and give hope to all of us. I am sure many of you must already be thinking on similar initiatives in your countries and regions.

4. India had taken the initiative to establish diplomatic relations with friendly countries even before her independence. One of the priority items on its foreign policy agenda was to help sister countries to gain independence from colonial rule and end discrimination and apartheid from the world. India believes sharing her knowledge and expertise with fellow-developing countries. Besides bilateral and multilateral cooperation, India offers help and assistance through various training and scholarship schemes. The Ministry of External Affairs offers civilian and defence training through the India Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme, cultural and educational scholarships through Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR), and training courses for foreign diplomats at the Foreign Service Institute (FSI). The Foreign Service Institute though originally conceived to cater to the training needs of Indian diplomats soon expanded to accommodate the training needs of developing countries. At present, it is organizing training courses for foreign diplomats all the year round and has signed Memoranda of Understanding with 34 countries. I have also been a propagator for this course. In all my travels, I have asked my counterpart foreign ministers to depute their diplomats for attending courses at FSI and I very happy to see such a big and diverse representation here today, from Afghanistan to Uzbekistan.

5. Today the job of diplomats is quite different from what it was in the last century. As one who spent nearly three decades in the UN, I have seen the transformation close-up and have some observations. Firstly, non-state organizations and NGOs are playing a significantly enlarged and important role. Secondly, though the primary duty of a diplomat still remains safeguarding the interests of his or her country and people, a diplomat is also engaged in the well-being, safety, and survival of the world and humanity. Issues like climate change, terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, etc. have become very real concerns of entire humanity. Water, food, health, energy, and migration, etc. have become very potent non-traditional security threats. Today a country's interests are inextricably linked to those of the whole world.

6. Contemporary India is changing rapidly and for this reason, it is important for me to highlight what today's India is all about. As you must have learnt, India is the world's largest democracy with a constitutional system of Government, an independent judiciary and a robust press. As one of the fastest developing countries, India has an important role in geo-politics of the world. One of the objectives of India's foreign policy is to address important issues of international importance, such as environmentally sustainable development and the promotion and protection of human rights.

7. India believes in the common destiny of mankind. It also believes in friendship, peace, and cooperation. We in India believe that the nature of problems and concerns of all developing countries are more or less the same. There is, therefore, need of fuller cooperation and solidarity amongst them through what is widely known as the South-South cooperation mechanism. Developing countries need to express their special needs and problems in unison and vocally at multilateral forums such as the UN and the WTO and also with the UNFCCC.

8. I am confident that the Course must have expressly or otherwise raised these issues. I also hope that by training together and having time to discuss freely and frankly, the participants in this course must have developed deeper understanding of each other's points of view as well. Tomorrow when these diplomats represent their respective countries as Ambassadors and High Commissioners, they will cooperate, negotiate and arrive at solutions together with a sense of empathy and concern for each other. If they are able to do so in some measure at least, I feel this Course can then be considered immensely successful and our efforts will stand vindicated.

9. I thank the Guest Faculty of FSI for taking time off from their busy schedule for delivering lectures to the diplomats. I congratulate the participating diplomats for successfully completing this Course. I see in them fast and enduring friends of India who, together with India, will work for the prosperity and security of the entire world. I wish them a safe return to their country and family. May they all have very successful careers and purposeful service to your nation and to the world community!

Thank you.

Thiruvananthapuram (Kerala), December 11, 2009.

It is a privilege to participate in the valedictory session of the India IT Summit being organized by the Confederation of Indian Industry and the Government of Kerala. At the outset, I would like to thank the CII and the Government of Kerala for giving me this honour and the opportunity to address this distinguished and knowledgeable gathering. I am sorry that I was unable to be here earlier to benefit from your discussions over the last couple of days.

2. Information Technology has given India impressive brand equity in the global market. It has raised the profile of the Indian economy and today India's strength in the IT sector is recognized the world over. Major advantages in talent, our skilled workforce, our improving urban infrastructure, a conducive business environment, favourable policy interventions by the Government and continuous robust growth in the domestic IT sector have made India a world leader in the global IT and BPO industries sector. Through the joint efforts of the Government and industry, software development and IT enabled services have emerged as niche opportunities for India in the global context.

3. This is why I suppose I am here, since my Ministry is not directly concerned with the major issues before you all. Indeed, our economic reforms are a major calling-card for India abroad. And yet all too often India's economic reforms remind me of the old saying about Indian diplomacy: it used to be said that Indian diplomacy was like the love-making of an elephant - it was conducted a very high level, accompanied by much bellowing, and the results are not known for two years. The same is true of many Indian economic reforms, which are promulgated from on high with much fanfare and then take an age to be implemented because of all the vested interests and obstacles that have to be overcome. But this is not true, and has never been true, of the IT sector, where we got it right from the start and where little reform has been needed because IT has been on the cutting edge internationally.

4. The Indian information technology industry has grown at a phenomenal pace over the last decade. Despite the global economic crisis, the IT-BPO sector grew by 12% in 2008-09 to reach US$ 71.7 billion in revenue (including hardware). Of this, software and services accounted for US$ 59.6 billion. The top three IT companies, namely, Infosys, TCS and Wipro, saw revenue growth from all important sources of income in 2008 and 2009. This growth was fuelled by increasing diversification in the geographic base and adaptation in their portfolios of service offerings. While the effects of the economic crisis are expected to linger on, the Indian IT-BPO industry has displayed remarkable tenacity and resilience in countering the unpredictable conditions and reiterating the viability of India's fundamental value proposition.

5. IT also plays a far more significant role in our economy than ever before. In terms of its share in GDP, revenue from the Information Technology sector has risen from 1.2% of GDP in 1997-98 to an estimated 5.8% of GDP in 2008-09. The sector's share in total Indian exports increased from less than 4% in 1998 to almost 16% in 2008. In terms of value, our IT-BPO exports, including hardware exports, grew by 16% from US$ 40.9 billion in 2007-08 to US$ 47.3 billion in 2008-09.

6. This growth in the IT sector has been possible through a combination of factors, including the inherent advantages of the Indian economy, innovative entrepreneurship on the part of Indian industry and Government interventions in the form of liberalization of foreign investment and export-import policies. Visionary leaders like Narayana Murthy of Infosys and Azim Premji of WIPRO have put India in the forefront of the IT revolution. Major international companies like Microsoft, Intel, Dell, IBM, Cisco and GE have started their production bases in India. Our brilliant IT professionals, who are not only leading the growth of the Indian IT-BPO sector but also of major multinationals like Microsoft and IBM, have made India proud.

7. As a result, IT has made its own contribution to India's soft power. When Americans speak of the IITs with the same reverence they used to accord to MIT or Caltech, and the Indianness of engineers and software developers is taken as synonymous with mathematical and scientific excellence, it is India that gains in respect. Sometimes this has unintended consequences. I met an Indian the other day, a history honours student like me, who told me of transiting through Schiphol airport in Amsterdam and being accosted by an anxious European saying "you're Indian! You're Indian! Can you help me fix my laptop?" The old stereotype of Indians was that of snake-charmers and sadhus; now every Indian abroad is assumed to be a software guru or a computer geek. This is all thanks to the global success of IT professionals.

8. Indian IT companies have also started making strategic investments abroad. Notable ones include: HCL Technologies entering into a strategic partnership with South Africa's UCS Group to acquire UCS's enterprise solutions SAP practice (focused on the retail sector), and software services firm MindTree making a foray into China, having bagged a significant outsourcing contract from China's biggest telecommunications equipment maker, Huawei Technologies.

9. Global trade in services has entered a new era with the growing and widespread acceptance of the IT-based global delivery model. With the availability of international bandwidth and powerful work-flow management, the IT software and services sector today is penetrating the fabric of society in every sphere. It is now possible, as Tom Friedman so vividly demonstrated in his book The World is Flat (itself inspired by a remark by our mutual friend Nandan Nilekani), to disaggregate any business process, execute the sub-processes in multiple centres around the world and reassemble them in near real time at another location. India has already made its mark on the global IT-BPO sector. India continues to be the nerve centre for global sourcing with over 2/3rds of the Fortune 500 and a majority of the Global 2000 firms leveraging global service delivery and sourcing from India.

10. India remains the most preferred destination for companies looking to offshore their IT and back-office functions. It also retains its low-cost advantage and is among the most financially attractive locations when viewed in combination with the business environment it offers and the availability of a skilled workforce. But India is not only about price advantages; we provide better quality at a lower price. Recognizing the need to provide qualified and trained manpower in this sector, the Government has already started 6 new IITs in 2008-09 and is in the process of setting up 30 new Central Universities, 10 new National Institutes of Technology, 20 new IIITs and 5 new Indian Institutes of Science.

11. The Government has taken several steps to promote the IT sector including allowing foreign direct investment under the automatic route, reduction in customs duties, abolishing customs duty on 217 items under the Information Technology Agreement, reduction in excise duty, simplification of procedures, special incentive packages for setting up IT related industries in India, liberalization of the foreign trade policy for electronics and IT products, promotion of R&D and development of entrepreneurship through assistance to institutions of higher learning to strengthen their technology incubation centers enabling young entrepreneurs to establish start-up companies.

12. In order to tap the resources of the leading national Institutes for collaborative research, the National Knowledge Commission has recommended the setting up of a high-speed digital broadband network throughout the country, with adequate capabilities and access speed. The primary objective of the Network is to provide gigabyte broadband connectivity to all institutions of higher learning and research in the country.

13. The IT Act of 2000 dealing with cyber security, cyber crime and other information security-related legal aspects has been enacted to encourage expansion of e-commerce through internet. The Data Security Council of India (DSCI) was launched in 2007 to institutionalize efforts to further enhance the information security environment in India. India is only the 12th nation globally to enact cyber laws.

14. India has not lagged behind in the High Performance Computing (HPC) arena. The Centre for Development of Advanced Computing (C-DAC) has developed in-house expertise for design and development of parallel processing technology based HPC systems, application development environments, system software tools and utilities, as well as development and porting of applications. C-DAC's PARAM series of HPC systems have 60 installations worldwide. C-DAC has set up a nationwide grid of HPC systems named 'Garuda', which enables collaborative R&D among HPC user community in various sectors of Science and Engineering.

15. While IT continues to be a major engine of growth for the economy through its contribution to GDP, exports and employment, our vision is to use IT as a tool for raising the living standards of the common man and bring Government services to the citizen's doorstep. Towards this end, Government has undertaken a massive programme of PC and internet penetration in the rural and under-served urban areas. To provide IT access in rural areas, the Government is implementing a Scheme for establishing State Wide Area Networks (SWANs) across the country which envisages providing technical and financial assistance to States for establishing SWANs from State Headquarters up to the Block level with a minimum bandwidth capacity of 2 Mbps.

16. In May 2006, the Government approved a National e-Governance Plan (NeGP) comprising 27 mission mode projects and 8 components, providing an important platform to upscale and integrate various e-governance initiatives at the Local, State and Central level. The key mantra of e-governance is "citizens first". It goes beyond computerization of government processes and into the realms of good governance which include issues of efficiency of service delivery, empowerment of citizens, transparency and accountability. In this context, the Ministry of External Affairs has undertaken a major public private partnership initiative called the Passport Seva Project that will enable people to apply for passports on-line. The project is expected to become operational next year and is expected to result in the issue of passports within 3 days, and where police verification is required, within three days of completion of the verification process.

17. On the international front, India is providing technical assistance in the IT sector to various developing countries in Africa, Asia, Latin America and East Europe. Given India's strength in the IT sector, a number of countries have indicated their preference to set up IT training centres and institutes with Indian assistance. India has already set up five such centres of excellence in Cuba, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras and Jamaica and six centres are in the pipeline in Grenada, Syria, Benin, Ecuador, Costa Rica and Cape Verde. Our assistance has included sending IT experts to run these centres for a period of two years and providing hardware and software for conducting training programmes. The centres are eventually handed over to the partner countries as an important resource for capacity building in these countries.

18. There is also a large interest among developing countries for more and more IT related courses under our ITEC programme. One-third of our total training slots numbering 1695, out of a total of 5000 slots offered to foreign countries during 2009-2010, are in the IT sector. Similarly, 1/4th of the total courses i.e. 52 out of 200 courses during the current financial year are IT related. This is indicative of the interest among ITEC participants from our 158 partner countries, in IT and IT related vocational training.

19. India's economic boom, combined with the exponential growth of its IT and knowledge industry sectors, offers numerous opportunities for our neighbouring countries and the world; as a growing market and services centre. IT companies like Infosys, TCS, and WIPRO have hired hundreds of software engineers from across the globe and have ambitious future plans.

20. The Indian IT sector is expected to continue its rapid growth in future. Our IT-BPO exports are expected to cross the US$ 60 billion target by 2011. Present employment of 2.23 million professionals in the sector is expected to increase to 2.5 to 3 million in the next 2 years thereby contributing substantially to the socio-economic development of the country. On a longer term, revenue from IT exports is expected to reach US$ 175 billion by 2020 while revenue from the domestic market is expected to contribute US$ 50 billion by 2020. Together, the export and domestic markets are expected to generate revenue of US$ 225 million by 2020 as opportunities emerge in new sectors and more and more economies rely on outsourcing (at least according to the NASSCOM - McKinsey Report).

21. The Indian IT-BPO industry is now at a critical point in its evolution. With a decade of impressive performance, it has to move forward in a new transformed macro-economic environment, rapidly changing customers and needs, evolving services & business models and rising stakeholder aspirations. India, with its fundamental advantages, can capture a large share of the immense opportunities available. However, to achieve this goal amidst current and future challenges and maintain our leadership position in this sector, concerted efforts are required by all key stakeholders, including industry, government and academia to work together for optimum results. Since the sector faces tough competition from other emerging economies, India will have to rely more on providing innovative indigenous solutions to increase business productivity rather than just provide services as per client specifications. In other words, Indian industry will have to take a lead and be more pro-active rather than be driven by global demands. This will also synergize with India reaping the benefit of its demographic dividend and its focus on emerging as a global economic super power by 2020.

22. In the 21st century, a country's soft power will be the defining feature of its global influence and reach. The Indian IT industry has built a strong reputation of excellence and high standards of service quality and information security. Indian software companies have earned the unique distinction of providing efficient software solutions with a cost and quality advantage by using state of the art of technology. There is, now, a need to build on our existing strengths and focus on future strategies for growth.

23. This would include research to develop indigenous software in new usage of IT technologies like cloud computing, out-of-the-box solutions, etc. This will also help Indian IT industry in playing a more active role in setting global IT standards. There is already a huge repository of codes in the form of open source software which can be harnessed to provide alternatives to imported software. A concerted and combined effort needs to be made by the Indian IT industry as a whole in this direction. On the internet connectivity front, India needs to work much harder to provide internet accessibility to a larger part of our population. At present, there are 60 million internet users in the country. The Manufacturer's Association of IT (MAIT) has outlined 'Goal 511', an ambitious target to increase the number of internet users to 500 million, and provide 100 million broadband connections and 100 million connected devices by 2012. Similarly, with the growing use of IT in all spheres of everyday life, IT security has come into prime focus and is of crucial importance. In view of the ongoing incidents of cyber warfare, Indian industry can play a major role in protecting India's IT assets and infrastructure by developing our own IT security products. Through a policy of sustained R&D in cutting edge technology, we must aim to further increase and broad base our exports while also expanding the domestic market.

24. The future holds immense potential for the IT sector requiring a focused and coordinated approach. I wish the CII and the IT industry all success in its future endeavours.

Thank you.

071. Valedictory Speech by the Minister of State Dr. Shashi Tharoor at the 2009 Education Summit-II in the theme of "Marketing of India's Higher Education Worldwide: Revisited".

New Delhi, December 12, 2009.

I am indeed delighted to be present here to deliver the valedictory address of this summit on 'Marketing of India's Higher Education Worldwide - Revisited', which the Indira Gandhi National Open University, in collaboration with the Institute of Marketing and Management, has hosted to highlight and emphasize India's growing importance in the global education sector. I congratulate both the Institutions for this initiative. I am pleased to know that this Summit is a follow up of the Conference organized by IGNOU and IMM on the same theme in the year 2007 and the success of that has brought them together again to discuss the merits of higher education in India as well as to persuade the policy-makers of our country to take note of the importance of the idea behind this event and initiate marketing of India's Higher Education Abroad.

2. I note that the deliberations of this meeting have focused on four thrust areas to attract students from abroad. I am of the view that Engineering and Technology, IT and Management, Tourism and Hospitality and Agriculture are indeed our strengths and therefore have high potential for marketing abroad with the purpose of attracting foreign students, particularly from the developing countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Here, however, I would like to place a caveat. There is great domestic demand for higher education and therefore marketing of Indian education abroad cannot be at the cost of denying our own citizens quality education at an affordable price. Education for foreigners in India, any substantial measure, can best take place after additional capacities have been generated in India. And if such capacities are created, then not only will Indian higher educational institutions attract foreign students, but they would also be able to attract the sizeable number of Indian students who go abroad in the search of higher education, often of dubious quality and certainly much more expensive as well as, in some places, occasionally unsafe.

3. Education in India has many comparative advantages in relation to education pursued in other countries. One of the advantages is with regard to cost. Some estimates indicate that the total cost of education for a student pursuing studies in India would be almost one-tenth of what it would be like USA or Europe for a comparable quality of education. Another advantage that India offers, despite being a developing country, is the diversity and depth of our knowledge pool and a vast education infrastructure. For this we owe a debt of gratitude to the vision and foresight of Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru who inspired the establishment of many institutions of higher learning including the Indian Institute of Technology (s), Indian Institute of Management (s) , All India Institute of Medical Sciences, and so many others, and many high impact initiatives such as Vikram Sarabhai's space programme and Homi Bhabha's atomic programme. I feel much pride in saying that successive Congress Governments have taken various steps for improving the quality of higher education and research by increasing allocation of funds. Today the launching pad for huge investment in higher education, both in qualitative and quantitative terms, is ready. All we need is concrete and directed action towards the establishment of more institutions of higher learning which would cater to the growing needs of the young people of India and also meet the needs of friendly countries.

4. India has always opened its doors and windows to the world and this includes extending a warm welcome to foreign students in India. I know that at any time not lower than 10,000 African students are studying in India and there are many more thousands from other countries of the world. And this is not a new development. Foreign students have been coming to India to study since our independence as they find India to be a hospitable country and our education of good quality and affordable. I have felt great pride in meeting foreign heads of state and Foreign Ministers who boast of an Indian university education. Currently, the Presidents of Afghanistan and Malawi both hold college degrees from India. Only last Sunday I delivered the convocation address of the Symbiosis University in Pune where I was delighted to see the presence of at least 70 students from not only countries of Asia and Africa but also from Europe and America. This clearly suggests that India is increasingly becoming a preferred destination for foreign students and many more would come to India in the coming years leading to healthy inter-exchange of students, peoples and ideas. Such exchanges undoubtedly can be augmented by more initiatives in this direction under the public-private partnership framework which dramatically increase our higher education capabilities.

5. As many of you may know, my Ministry is also closely linked to the international aspect of Indian education. Indian missions abroad have always facilitated the international exposure of Indian education by routinely providing requisite information about admission process in Indian universities and by providing consular services. The Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR), which is closely related to the Ministry of External Affairs (MEA), has a robust fellowship programme for foreign students as well. Under this scheme, approximately 2500 students come to India every year to study and at any moment of time there are at least 3500 students in India pursuing graduate, post-graduate and doctoral studies, thanks to ICCR. Students from almost 80 countries avail of the fellowship each year. In addition, MEA also administers the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) scholarship programme under which thousands of professionals come to India every year for mid-career training programmes. These fellowship programmes have indeed become a strong aid to Indian diplomacy and are creating enormous goodwill and understanding for India in foreign countries. I have personally found it a matter of immense satisfaction and pride when I come across foreign interlocutors who have studied in India and have praise and appreciation for my country.

6. Indian higher educational institutes have tremendous resources buried with them by way of huge campuses and world renowned faculty which need to be utilized to the fullest extent. With our thriving economy now, India provides an attractive destination for international students to be part of India's growth story. We have noted that statistics show growth of Indian students going abroad but slow progress when it comes to foreign students coming to India. To deal with such a situation, we, as I have said before, need to augment our capabilities as well as evolve a strong and practical strategy for effective marketing of India's education abroad. We have to fill gaps in the system and make regulations and environment friendlier for international students. Various steps like moulding existing courses according to the needs of international students, introducing "Study India Programmes" (SIP) to make them aware of the rich Indian cultural heritage and introducing a new credit-based system and evaluation process are the need of the hour.

7. There is also need for increasing interaction among Indian and foreign universities of repute, exchange of faculties with advanced universities abroad to help Indian teachers learn global standards in education and encouragement for academics to participate in research activities in close collaboration with industry. We also have to work on ensuring that degrees and diplomas issued by Indian institutes are recognized the world over and also when foreign students come to India, that their degrees and diplomas are recognized here. This will make India more suitable and desirable for foreign student communities.

8. Collaboration with foreign institutes of repute will provide much needed exposure to Indian institutes and hone and upgrade skills of our faculties. In this context, I applaud the recent initiatives of the Ministry of Human Resource Development to liberalize the higher education sector. This will have a cascading impact on improving university standards in India and consequently be beneficial to our educational institutions.

9. Ladies and Gentlemen, I have in my address touched broadly upon some ideas which will improve the attractiveness of India as an education destination. We have seen the success of the 'Incredible India' campaign of the Ministry of Tourism which has not only resulted in greater foreign tourist footfalls in India but also at the same time improved our Indian tourism infrastructure. I would suggest that we should now launch a public-private partnership campaign on the lines of 'Learning in India' to achieve the same results in the education sector. One day, I am confident that India will become an education destination for legions of foreign students, just as the US became in the 20th century. It is a goal well worth striving for.

Thank you.

072. Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the Delhi Sustainable Development Summit - 2009.

New Delhi, February 5, 2009.

Her Royal Highness Princess Maha Chakri Sirindhorn, Princess, Kingdom of Thailand;

HE Ms Tarja Halonen, President of Finland;

HE Mr Anote Tong, President of the Republic of Kiribati;

HE Mr Meles Zenawi, Prime Minister of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia;

HE Mr Ban Ki-moon, Secretary-General, United Nations;

HE Mr Maumoon Abdul Gayoom, Former President of Maldives;

HE Mr Moritz Leuenberger, Former President of Switzerland

HE Mr Mamadou Lamine Loum, Former Prime Minister of Senegal and

Dr. RK Pachauri, Director General, TERI.

Excellencies, Distinguished Guests, ladies and gentlemen,

It is my pleasure to be invited here to inaugurate the Delhi Sustainable Development Summit 2009. I am very happy to see this gathering of Nobel laureates, policy makers, thought leaders, scientists and outstanding professionals from across the globe who have come here to focus on the challenge of sustainable development.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen,

The concept of sustainable development is engrained in the ethos of India. Our traditions and practices have imbibed the philosophy of sustainable development and we have been able to conserve and protect our natural resources. It is, therefore, fitting that this Summit on Sustainable Development is being held in New Delhi and I would like to congratulate TERI and specially Dr. Pachauri for having made this Summit into one of the premier annual events in the world.

Sustainable Development, though widely used, is a fairly new concept having been first mooted in the 1980s and then embedded into our collective consciousness since the Rio Summit of 1992. While its origins are in the concept of environment protection, Sustainable Development encompasses within itself a much wider gamut of issues and, in particular, the "interdependent and mutually reinforcing pillars" of economic development, social development, and environmental protection. There can, therefore, be no environmental protection without concomitant economic development.

India is a developing country and our overriding priorities would be always poverty reduction and rapid economic development. This is critical if we are to be able to provide to our people the means and ways to achieve their aspirations and the way to a better life. Environmental protection cannot be isolated from the general issues of development and must be viewed as an integral part of development efforts. For us, the concept of "sustainable development" must include the needs of our people for health, nutrition, education and housing with a view towards the eradication of poverty so as to provide to all a life of dignity in a clean, safe and healthy environment. Stress needs to be placed equally on the "development" dimension of the concept of "sustainable development" as on its "sustainable" aspect.

We, in the Government of India, have based our policies on sustainable development on the principle that human beings are at the centre of sustainable development. Our emphasis has been on the fact that the right to development must equitably meet the developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations. The dominant theme in our policies has been that while we must conserve environmental resources to secure livelihoods, the most effective way of doing this is to ensure that people benefit more from conservation than from resource degradation.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen,

We, in India, are extremely concerned about climate change especially as, being a developing country, we are most likely to be adversely impacted. All indications point to the fact that we, as developing countries would have to bear a disproportionately severe impact of its adverse effects even though responsibility lies with those countries which have been polluting since industrialization began. It is a sad reality that some of the worst impacts of climate change will take place in developing countries which have had no share in having caused the problem. Today, there is universal acceptance that climate change is unequivocal. In fact, the Fourth Assessment Report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), of which Dr.

Pachauri is the Chairman, has clearly established the fact that climate change is taking place.

India recognizes the need for global action to address climate change. The negotiations under the Bali Action Plan and their outcome must respect, both in letter and spirit, the provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), especially the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. We expect the developed countries to take the lead in reducing emissions of greenhouse gases and commit themselves to absolute binding emissions reduction. The need of the hour is adapting to the inevitability of climate change and for that we need to have the necessary financial and technological wherewithal. As we have always maintained, development would give us the necessary capability for adaptation.

India is committed to taking action to address climate change even though our per capita emissions of greenhouse gases are extremely low in relation to all the developed countries, and even lower than those of several developing countries. India, with 17% of the world population has only 4% of global GHG emissions. In per-capita terms India is at 1 ton/annum, a quarter of the global average of 4 tons/annum.

Yet we will do what we can to pursue a path of development that is sensitive to the need for tackling this global challenge. With this in view we have developed our National Action Plan on Climate Change with eight national Missions, including on solar power, energy efficiency and promoting forest cover. This would help India pursue a path of sustainable development and ensure low carbon intensity of the Indian economy.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen,

The key issue in negotiations on climate change is burden sharing which has to be equitable. I note that this Summit would be looking at the equitable and ethical aspects of climate change. India believes that every citizen of our planet has an equal right to the global resource of the atmosphere.

The Prime Minister of India had stated clearly that India is determined that its per capita emissions would not exceed those of the developed countries, even as it pursues policies of development and economic growth. What could be a greater commitment than this? The responsibility, therefore, lies with the developed world to set the direction and take the lead in bringing about reductions in emissions per capita.

The world is currently facing a financial crisis of immense magnitude that will reverse years of hard-earned economic growth. This crisis would affect developing countries even though, like climate change, we were not responsible for it. There are no 'bail-outs' for a climate crisis. The financial crisis should not become an excuse for developed countries to renege on their commitments. Climate Change should also not be an excuse to add a greater burden or impose conditionalities onto the development challenges that developing countries face.

Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen,

It is time for us to act together. Climate change is indeed a threat but it also presents a unique opportunity, an opportunity to work together as we have demonstrated through our response to the global financial crisis. The large amounts of public funds that are being deployed to address the financial crisis is a testimony to the fact that we can, given the requisite political will, generate similar funds to tackle climate change. A large part of these funds could be mobilized to support a major collaborative effort between developed and developing countries to deal with climate change. This could include a global fund to promote renewable energy, both in terms of application of existing technologies as well as R&D into new and innovative technologies.

It is also important that adequate finance is available for the world to take action. This has to be made available to developing countries to facilitate their move towards a low carbon pathway. We should ensure that these funds are new and additional without diverting already scarce development assistance. As I have mentioned before, economic development is critical for us so that we have the necessary resources to cope and adapt to the adverse effects of climate change.

Before I end, let me emphasise again the issue of sustainable development. We are all inhabitants of planet earth and in the ultimate analysis anything negative that occurs in any part of the globe will not leave any other part of the world immune. We have to, therefore, utilize the resources that mother Earth gives us in a sustainable manner. All countries, particularly developed countries, have to eschew lifestyles which are unsustainable and are a burden on our planet.

Mahatma Gandhi made a profound observation, which I feel should serve as our guiding principle in global efforts to preserve our planet. He said, and I quote, "The earth, the air, the land and the water, are not an inheritance from our forefathers, but a loan from our children. So we have to hand over to them at least as it was handed over to us".

I am sure that this Summit would discuss many issues of substance and come up with various scenarios solutions. On my part, I would consider the biggest gain from a gathering such as this is possibly the creation of a spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding among nations. I wish all the best in your deliberations and discussions.

Thank you.

073. Speech by Special Envoy of the Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran on Geo - Political Consequences of Current Financial and Economic Crisis: Implications for India.

New Delhi, February 28, 2009.

Dr. Shankar Acharya, Thank you for chairing this Session. I am deeply honoured by your presence. I would also like to express my appreciation to the India Habitat Centre and Mr. Raj Lieberhan for providing a forum for this interaction on a subject that has so far been off the radar in this country. It is my firm belief that even while we learn to cope with the more immediate impact of the on-going financial and economic crisis, we should look more closely at the manner in which the crisis may be changing, in a fundamental manner, the global geo-political landscape as well as the dominant ideologies which were accepted wisdom in most parts of our world.

Let us first look at the nature of the financial and economic crisis itself. It is a crisis that originated in the US and has now spread over the entire global economy. The Western dominance of the global financial markets and the global economy as a whole has been shaken to the core. It is possible that New York and London may no longer regain their undisputed status as the central financial markets of the world. With this has come an intellectual crisis engendering an open questioning of the western espousal of the magic of the market place, the belief in self-regulating market mechanisms and the relentless retreat of the state from virtually all key areas of economic life. These twin crises are beginning to spawn significant and far-reaching political consequences. One relates to the redistribution of political power based on real economic strength. The other relates to perceptions, which are equally important, shaking confidence in market based liberalism that has been the dominant dogma for the past two centuries and more.

First, let us examine the chief characteristics of the crisis.

In essence, it is the consequence of unsustainable imbalances in the global economy i.e. prolonged fiscal and trade deficits in the U.S. matched by fiscal surpluses and astronomical foreign exchange reserves in China, but also smaller surpluses in other economies such as the oil exporting Gulf and Japan.

These imbalances will need correction through a sizeable increase in saving and decrease in consumption in the U.S. and associated Western economies, while China will need to save less and consume more - China today saves over 40% of its GDP -. It seems to us that neither is likely to happen in the near future. In order to avoid a recession and promote the recovery of its economy, the U.S. has deployed and may continue to deploy progressively larger monetary and fiscal stimulus packages. The same is being witnessed in the market economies of Europe. This will push their economies in a direction opposite of the basic adjustment required, and can only be justified as a temporary palliative. The subsequent adjustments will have to be that much more significant and far-reaching, the larger the deficits are today. On the other hand, China's saving rate is likely to remain high. Asians, including Chinese, respond to difficult times, by saving more not less, particularly, where social security safety nets are absent. China has announced a large spending package for infrastructure, but this will only increase the significant excess capacity that already exists in infrastructure, whether these are highways, ports or building construction.

The US and China have become joined at the hip over the past couple of decades. This is what Kissinger said in a recent article:

"China made possible the American consumption splurge by buying American debt; America helped the modernization and reform of the Chinese economy by opening its markets to Chinese goods. Both sides overestimated the durability of this arrangement."

If this arrangement has to be progressively adjusted towards a new balance without risking economic collapse, an extraordinary and unprecedented level of consultation, coordination and understanding would be required between the two countries.

Let us consider what is required.

The US will need to reduce its trade deficit through a deliberate and graduated decline in the value of the US dollar. As this will lead to the progressive decline in the value of China's vast dollar holdings - China currently holds US $ 1.1 trillion in US debt including US $ 652 billion in US Treasury debt - it will have to acquiesce in this erosion of wealth rather than seek to significantly diversify its reserves. Will China play ball?

China will need to resist the temptation to save its vast export industry from rapid decline and ruin, by devaluing its currency vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar, or at least keep the current parity level. The U.S. interest, on the other hand, will be to persuade the Chinese not merely to maintain the current value of the Yuan, but to revalue significantly. Can these two contrary interests be reconciled? It is estimated that closure of export factories has already led to 20 million workers in China becoming unemployed. Will the creation of new jobs in the infrastructure sector help mitigate the retrenchment in the export sector? The evidence is that the latter, for the moment, is outpacing the former. What is the scale of destruction of its industry and rising unemployment, which a Yuan revaluation would further exacerbate, that China would be willing to tolerate?

For its part, the US appears to be working on the assumption that dependent as China is on the health of the global and particularly the U.S. economy, it will, in fact, be persuaded to do the unprecedented things that may be required. For this persuasion to work, the U.S. is embarking on an equally unprecedented diplomatic offensive to co-opt China in its economic recovery strategy.

For example:

There are increasing calls for a Sino-US global condominium, a so-called G-2, which would shape a new world order. Some like former Secretary of State, Brzezinski, have gone much further than others, calling for a "comprehensive, global partnership, paralleling our relations with Europe and Japan." Brzezinski elaborated this further by recommending a US-China peacekeeping force to deal with failed states and a strategic dialogue to cover India-Pakistan, Israel-Palestine and the Iran issue.

Though somewhat less dramatic, even Kissinger has called for taking Sino-US relations to a new level, at par with trans-Atlantic relations forged in the post-World War II period.

The new US Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton, has echoed these sentiments by describing Sino-US relations as the most important bilateral relationship for the incoming Administration.

This implies an apparent willingness on the part of the US to accommodate China's regional and global interests as a price to be paid for China refraining from tipping the US into a full blown economic and financial crisis through its own policy interventions and, hopefully, supporting US economic recovery. China is being invited to participate in the fashioning of new global governance structures and have a major voice in the management, if not resolution, of major regional conflicts.

China has not revealed its hand so far. It has certainly encouraged thinking in the U.S. and the West that it is the key to their economic recovery. This provides it with a significant leverage for achieving its foreign policy objectives even though on the ground it may be able or willing to do much less.

A brief look at the structure of the Chinese economy may be useful in this context.

The Chinese economy continues to be dominated by State-owned enterprises which are largely domestic market-oriented or are engaged in commodity production and trade. The country's export economy, which is the most dynamic, is occupied by two categories of enterprises: These are either wholly owned subsidiaries of foreign companies or joint ventures between State-owned enterprises and foreign companies. There is yet only a small percentage occupied by private enterprise, though this segment is growing. The high growth rates enjoyed by the Chinese economy has been, and continues to be, generated by these two categories of enterprises. The export economy today constitutes over 40% of the country's GDP. If this segment of the economy continues to decline as rapidly as currently, China may not be able to sustain the 7-7.5% GDP growth that its leaders believe is required to avoid widespread financial and political unrest in the country due to growing unemployment. If such unrest indeed becomes widespread, China's leadership will certainly wish to first address this threat with all the instruments available, including economic and trade policies designed to protect their industry and employment.

The above scenario suggests that China's role in global economic recovery may be more limited than is being envisaged in some quarters, although it is likely that China will emerge from this crisis in a relatively stronger position than before.

I would not like to leave behind an impression that only China is likely to be threatened by political and social unrest as a result of the global economic crisis. This affliction may, in fact, be quite widespread, affecting even mature and politically stable societies. The most vulnerable will obviously be countries that are already at the margin of economic survival. There may be more failed and failing states, the possibility of more widespread radical movements and an expansion of zones of conflict in different parts of the world. It will require the major states of the world to demonstrate a very high degree of collaborative engagement to keep a handle on these multiple crises, precisely at a time when their attention may be inexorably drawn inwards towards domestic preoccupations. Depressing as this may sound, it is a scenario that we should be fully prepared to confront. What is happening today in India's neighbourhood is a visible pointer.

This is, therefore, one of those rare occasions in history when predicting even the near future is fraught with deep uncertainty. The one certainty is that the economic and financial crisis is putting all major countries and economies, through a global shaker and it is not clear which way the dice will eventually fall. What can be predicted with some degree of confidence is that the global landscape which will eventually emerge when the dust finally settles down, will be vastly different from what it is today.

Its contours, however, are not yet clear.

What are the implications for India?

For India, this is not necessarily a negative. It creates for us, other things being equal, greater strategic space. We will have more room for manoeuvre in managing our relations with a more diverse set of powers, and do so with more flexibility.

It should be our objective to encourage the trend towards a more diffused and diversified international order. This fits in well with our own instinctive preference for a multipolar world, which includes a multipolar Asia. We will need to work with other powers who share this objective. Our effort should be to build coalitions on different issues of shared concern and not primarily rely on a more limited range of strategic relationships.

This will imply a more energetic pursuit of our relations with countries like Russia and middle powers like Brazil, South Africa and Mexico. The European Union and, in particular, some of its individual members like France, can be useful political and economic partners. Europe seems currently torn between a desire to salvage Western dominance, on the one hand, and to lead the way towards an ambitious restructuring of the global political and economic governance structures on the other. We should encourage the latter trend.

With the US, we have built an extraordinarily broad-ranging relationship, which is likely to endure a change of political guard in either country. We must remain fully invested in this critical relationship, even while remaining alert to the possible threat to India's interests as the US pursues its larger goals especially in our region.

Closer home in Asia, we will need deeper engagement with Japan and Indonesia and of course, a more nuanced diplomacy towards China. We have several areas of convergent interest with China, quite apart from a rapidly expanding trade and economic relationship. Our positions on multilateral trade, climate change and several other global issues are similar. At the same time, we should acknowledge that there are competitive components in our relations, which will need to be managed with prudence but firmness.

In this context, the prospect of a Sino-US strategic convergence has caused some anxiety in India. The situation is more complicated than it appears. China itself is hedging its bets by pursuing a number of parallel bilateral and regional strategies.

For example, while consulting closely with the US, it has also worked together with Japan and South Korea to create a North-East Asian swap arrangement and promised to consider a regional economic recovery package. China is also interested in adding substance to BRIC (Brazil, Russia, India and China) and put security issues also on its agenda. It is promoting both the Shanghai Cooperation process as well as a closer and more comprehensive relationship with South East Asia. It would be prudent for India to follow a similar hedging strategy as well, in its relations with other major powers and groupings. This will include an intensified engagement and dialogue with China itself, including on its interest in promoting a grouping of major emerging economies or on a new security architecture in Asia. India's approach should be to position itself innovatively in a manner that enables it not only to ride-over this crisis with relatively less adverse impact but more importantly, to ensure a position of advantage for itself as a new international and geo-political landscape begins to emerge.

Our political prospects will inevitably be determined not only by how we weather the current storm, but whether we have strategies that enable us to emerge from the crisis as among the foremost of the economies of the world, and as one of the key drivers of the global economy. We will need to go beyond the defensive and survival-first strategies which currently dominate our thinking. Instead, we need to carefully assess what our strengths and vulnerabilities are as a continental-sized emerging economy, and articulate a forward-looking economic game plan on that basis.

What are our likely vulnerabilities?

At least for some time to come, the impact of the global crisis could well lead to diminished markets overseas and the revival of protectionist tendencies in those markets. There may be, similarly, diminished prospects for attracting inward investment from major capital-exporting countries. In short, the global economic environment may not be as supportive of India's growth prospects as it has been during the past decade and a half. To the extent that our higher growth trajectory has been associated with the globalisation of the Indian economy, leveraging the liberal economic environment prevailing in major Western and other market economies, the downward pressure on our growth prospects may be unavoidable.

Secondly, all major economies will end up being more regulated than before. There will be more State intervention, initially by default and eventually by choice. There is a real possibility that a new economic orthodoxy will emerge where the state will, once again, become not only a regulator but a major economic actor. The tendency in countries like India would be to uncritically slip into a similar mode of thinking. Our statist legacy makes us particularly susceptible in this regard. We must guard against this.

What are the strengths we can leverage to position India as a leading economic and political power, post-crisis?

Some opportunities appear to be to be worth pursuing.

- For example, we should use the opportunity created by the crisis to consolidate pro-actively our economic interaction with our neighbours including through unilateral and asymmetric steps, if necessary. Our current policy line is that without a politically stable and economically prosperous neighbourhood, India will find it difficult to pursue its regional and global interests. It is time to put substance into this approach, even though current preoccupations with developments in Pakistan, Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Nepal do cause anxiety. As the economic crisis hits the economies of our more fragile neighbours, we should accelerate regional economic integration through a series of economic support measures. An India-initiated South Asia Economic Recovery Initiative could be explored.

- We could use the opportunity of depressed commodity and other prices to acquire productive assets abroad while they are cheap, buying energy and raw-material sources, for instance, and making strategic investments abroad. The political obverse of this would be a strong outreach in Africa and West Asia and other developing countries, revitalising our developing country constituency through targeted initiatives.
- The Indian IT industry is likely to be significantly impacted due to loss of overseas markets as well as protectionist trends. So far the IT industry has been focused on the export market. It has not looked at the domestic market as a significant business opportunity. Now could be the time to do this. More competitive conditions in both domestic as well as external markets require Indian industry to be more efficient and productive. This is where our IT industry can play a significant role, but this will require the dynamic sectors of the economy, the service sector and the manufacturing sector, to come together to deliver a major punch, once the global economy settles down into a new and altered landscape. There should be a willingness in business and industry to think through and come up with an ambitious and potentially winning strategy. They should seek government support for delivering on such a strategy rather than looking only for short-term relief.
- There is little doubt that for at least the next 3 to 5 years, if not more, we will find a buyer's market in a wide range of sectors due to the global slowdown. There is already significant excess capacity in capital goods and infrastructure sectors. Not only are more economical prices on offer but probably better terms and conditions for technology transfer as well. There is a window of opportunity for government and business to take advantage of these favourable conditions, to accelerate the upgradation of our transport networks, build more state of the art airports and seaports, build ten instead of only one high speed rail freight corridors, extend mass public transportation networks to all major towns and cities, and most of all, solve the power problem once for all. The civil nuclear agreement is a timely instrument in our hands today. As investment in the nuclear renaissance in the developed world slows down, India could source many more high capacity nuclear reactors on the most competitive terms, if it wishes to. The country can leverage its financial credibility in the global market, to raise the funds required. We have to package and project ourselves as part of the solution to the global economic recession and not as its tragic victim. As a sound, credit-worthy and growing economy, with relatively less exposure to the buffeting of the global crisis, we are still a good bet, a low-risk and potentially high-return economy. But we will need to communicate these strengths more effectively to the rest of the world than we have so far.

- The inter-related crisis of climate change and energy security has already triggered a wave of innovations in renewable energy, such as solar energy, bio-mass and wind energy. The United States and, to some extent, Europe are the chief repository of such innovations. We have several interesting initiatives being pursued in India as well, though these are scattered in different locations, both in the public and private sectors. It is inevitable that, for some time to come, many of the venture capital initiatives in the area of renewable energy in the US and Western Europe, may run out of steam as money flows dry up. The decrease in oil prices, even though temporary in nature, will further reinforce this trend. India must not lose its long-term perspective. Its energy security demands an accelerated and significant shift from dependence on fossil fuels, increasingly imported, to renewables especially solar energy. Here is an opportunity for Indian business and industry to plug into the innovation chains in U.S., Europe and Japan, to help us bring about that shift. Energy of every kind will always be a big and growing business in India. Renewable energy will be even bigger. We should have the wisdom and foresight to grasp the opportunity we have today, to emerge as leader of tomorrow. We should map our future as a modern, state of the art, carbon free economy and a renewable energy leader within the next couple of decades. A stimulus package that promotes these initiatives will create productive assets which will help overcome the deficits which will inevitably have to be bridged in the future.

What are the key messages for India in terms of the likely Geo-political Consequences of the Global Financial and Economic Crisis?

- Our diplomacy will need to gear up for a more diffused, decentralised and complex international landscape, populated by several major powers, with US enjoying a significantly diminished predominance. Though complex, the new international terrain will create more space for India to emerge as a key driver of global economics and politics. In the meantime, we will need to deal with the continuing uncertainty across the globe through hedging strategies, encompassing multiple and concurrent bilateral, regional and multilateral relationships.

- In relative terms, India's economy is likely to be less severely impacted than economies that are much more globalised and export and FDI driven. This gives the country an opportunity to expand its regional and global profile, but this may require a significant reorientation of our diplomatic assets towards promoting regional economic integration and political stability in our own periphery. Our aim should be to emerge from this crisis as an economy in which each of our neighbours have a significant stake. This must be paralleled by a political engagement strategy that is nuanced and goes beyond the state-to-state level dynamics.
- We will need to restructure our economy to play on our strengths such as in IT and reduce our vulnerabilities, for example, in infrastructure. There should be a strategy to take long-term advantage of the depressed global market conditions both for capital equipment and strategic commodities, including nuclear energy. This is an opportunity for acquiring strategic economic assets abroad as well as critical technologies on more favourable terms.
- Finally, we should use the challenge of climate change to fundamentally shift the Indian economy from its reliance on depleting fossil fuels, to a significant use of renewable energy. This will promote India's energy security and spur technological innovation and change, positioning India as a front-ranking power once the current crisis begins to recede.

Let me conclude by saying that we need to think in very unconventional ways to deal with a very unconventional crisis. In the Global 2020 Document - Mapping the Global Future - it is stated and I quote:

"Linear analysis will get you a much-changed caterpillar but it won't get you a butterfly. For that you need a leap of imagination". I am certain that imagination is one resource that is never in short supply in this country.

Thank you.

074. Statement by Special Envoy of the Prime Minister for Climate Change Shyam Saran during UNFCCC Talks.

Bonn (Germany), April 7, 2009.

Dear Friends, representatives of the Media,

I welcome this opportunity to interact with you and to share with you our perspective on the ongoing multilateral negotiating process leading up to the 15th Conference of Parties in Copenhagen at the end of this year.

Let me begin by affirming categorically that India, as also other developing countries, have a vital stake in the successful conclusion of our multilateral negotiations. The reason is not far to seek. It is developing countries like India which would be most impacted by the adverse consequences of climate change. It is our prospects for social and economic development which would be significantly eroded if we fail to agree upon an effective global response to an urgent and compelling global challenge. Our response has to be collaborative. This would lead to an ambitious outcome which citizenry all over the world legitimately expects. It should not be aimed merely at reconciling competitive interests and positions. This would only deliver a least common denominator outcome.

We believe that the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change represents an international consensus arrived at after very protracted and complex negotiations. This must be the basis on which we pursue a successful outcome at Copenhagen. Yes, the situation today is different from 1992 when the Convention was concluded; but the situation is different only in the sense that it has made the implementation of the principles and provisions of the Convention more urgent and compelling, thanks to the heightened concerns over climate change. Which is why the Bali Action Plan reaffirmed the validity of the Convention and mandated us, as negotiators, to seek the enhanced implementation of the Convention with the 4 pillars- mitigation, adaptation, technology and finance as a comprehensive package, within an agreed shared vision of long term cooperative action. The Copenhagen outcome should be able to demonstrate clearly and unambiguously, that each of the decisions that it takes, conforms to the enhanced implementation of the specific provisions of the Convention as elaborated in the Bali Action Plan.

We believe that not only must the outcome at Copenhagen be ambitious, it must also be equitable. The principle of equity is a theme which underlies the entire body of the Framework Convention and cannot be set aside through appeals to selective emissions arithmetic, in particular the neglect of the principle of historical responsibility. The stress we lay on this consensus principle is sometimes misinterpreted as an avoidance of our own responsibility to contribute to tackling the challenge of climate change. As a developing country, we do have a responsibility, which is to pursue ecologically sustainable development. We take our responsibilities very seriously and this is evident from the fact that in the past decade, we have delivered 9% annual growth in our GDP with only 4% annual increase in our energy use.

To ensure that climate change is one of the top priority items on our national agenda, the Prime Minister has set up, under his own Chairmanship, a multi-sectoral and multi-disciplinary Council on Climate Change. It is under the guidance of this Council that India has adopted an ambitious and comprehensive National Action Plan on Climate Change with 8 National Missions covering both mitigation and adaptation and has a significant R&D and technology development component. These Missions are being elaborated through a process of wide ranging consultations among all major stakeholders and are likely to be unveiled shortly. With the implementation of these National Missions, India would have significantly enhanced its own sustainable development strategies.

India is not waiting for external support in pursuing its sustainable development objectives. However, there is no doubt that a supportive and equitable climate change regime would enable us to significantly scale up our own efforts.

We are participating actively and constructively in the ongoing multilateral negotiations. This is in our interest. We have suggested a number of cooperative initiatives and sought to promote consensus on some of the key issues still outstanding in the negotiations. We are encouraged that our proposal to set up a network of Climate Innovation Centres to accelerate the development, dissemination and transfer of key climate relevant technologies, has received broad support from both developed and developing countries. India has contributed to the articulation of an effective architecture which can respond to the ongoing challenge of adaptation to climate change, an issue as important as mitigation, particularly for developing countries. And we have also contributed to the ongoing deliberations on financing, by contributing ideas on how best to mobilize the resources required for dealing with climate change as well as the institutional and governance mechanism this requires. These and other contributions by India may be accessed on the web-site of the UNFCCC.

We have only a few months left in which we must come up with concrete and significant decisions to be adopted by the 15th COP. The progress achieved so far has been disappointing from our perspective. We still have no clear indication about the emission reduction targets which our developed country parties are ready to commit to. There is still no clarity over the scale of financial and technological resources that would be available to developing countries to enable them to meet the additional burden imposed by adaptation and also to meet the full incremental costs of nationally appropriate mitigation actions. Nevertheless, we are optimistic that sooner rather than later, a sense of shared challenge and a collaborative spirit will inform our subsequent deliberations as we write the final and decisive chapter of what could become an epic and historic journey towards Copenhagen. Leaving the chapter unfinished is not really an option in the face of an escalating challenge for humanity.

075. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs on an amendment moved by India to Kyoto Protocol at the Conference on climate change in the run up to the Copenhagen Conference.

Bonn, June 18, 2009.

On June 12, 2009 at Bonn, India joined together with 36 other developing countries from Asia, Africa and Latin America, to move an amendment to the Kyoto Protocol which would ensure that developed countries commit themselves to GHG emission reduction targets which are the considered the minimum required in view of the enormity of the challenge that the world confronts from climate change.

The target set is for at least a 40% aggregate reduction for 2020 with 1990 as a base year. In addition, the amendment sets out indicative targets for individual developed countries based on the principle of historical responsibility. This takes into account the total contribution of individual developed countries to the accumulated GHG emissions in the planetary atmosphere since the industrial revolution began in 1850 till 2005.

The objective of this initiative, which is supported by China, Brazil, South Africa, Indonesia, Pakistan, Malaysia, Algeria, Kenya, Tanzania and several other Asian, African and Latin American countries, is to hasten the pace of negotiations on this key element in the Bali Road Map. Indication of what developed countries are prepared to undertake in fulfillment of their obligations under the Kyoto Protocol has been grossly inadequate despite the fact that only 6 months are left till the Copenhagen Conference of Parties on Climate Change in December 2009.

This initiative is being seen as a major landmark in the ongoing negotiations on climate change under the UNFCCC and a strong rebuff to countries which have been attempting to abandon the Kyoto Protocol.

The proposal will now be a key agenda item when negotiations resume in Bonn in August this year in the run up to the Copenhagen Conference.

076. Statement by Special Envoy to the Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran.

Bonn, June 19, 2009.

Dear Friends, representatives of the Media,

I welcome this opportunity to meet the distinguished members of the media and to share with you our assessment of the current state of play in the ongoing negotiations leading upto Copenhagen, This will be a brief opening statement so that we have more time for interaction and give you an opportunity to pose any question that you may have.

In the Working Group on Long - Term Cooperative Action, we have completed the second phase of our work and now possess a working document which should enable delegations, in the third phase, to begin the exercise of formulating convergent texts, wherever possible, and identifying areas which still need further reflection and engagement. It is our conviction that as long as delegations adhere to the principles and provisions of the UNFCCC and follow faithfully, the mandate spelt out in the Bali Action Plan, a comprehensive, balanced and equitable outcome in Copenhagen will be achieved. Let us not forget the objective of these negotiations is not a new Climate Treaty, but rather the enhanced implementation of the principles and provisions of the existing and valid climate treaty, which is UNFCCC.

The parallel track being pursued at these negotiations is the Kyoto Protocol track. Here again, there should be no ambiguity about what our objective is. We are not negotiating a new Protocol. The Kyoto Protocol does not cease to exist in 2012. It will remain valid and in effect until such time as the State Parties decide to abrogate it or amend it or decide to replace it with another legal instrument. This is not what these current negotiations are about. They are about commitments on emission reductions, to be assumed by developed country Parties, included in Annex I of the Protocol, for the second commitment period which will commence in 2013. It is a matter of deep regret that most Annex I countries are unlikely to meet their emission reduction obligations set further for the first commitment period. And it is a matter of even deeper concern that there has been hardly any progress on the achieving the key objective of our negotiations, that is to announce the second commitment period targets, which must be of a scale equal to the challenge we face from global climate change. Some individual targets that have been indicated fall far short of what is required, and there are inadmissible attempts to abandon the agreed baseline for emission reductions, which in the Protocol, is set at 1990. We hope that by the time we return to Bonn in August, this unsatisfactory state of affairs, will witness positive change. A Copenhagen outcome without clarity on this important issue is unlikely.

In India, we have a new Government in office, headed by Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh. It is our intention to put action on climate change among the list of key priorities for the Government. We have completed the elaboration of most of the National Missions included in the National Action Plan on Climate Change. These detailed mission documents will now be considered by the Prime Minister's Council on Climate Change, chaired by the PM himself, before implementation proceeds. The elaboration and prioritization of the remaining Missions is being stepped up and should be completed shortly. Taken together, these national missions will significantly enhance the ecological sustainability of India's growth, spur technological innovation, and ensure that energy does not become a constraint on India's ability to achieve the scale of accelerated development it requires to eradicate poverty.

079. Press Conference of Foreign Secretary Shivshankar Menon and Special Envoy to the Prime Minister Shyam Saran.

L'Aquila (Italy), July 8, 2009.

Foreign Secretary (FS)- Sorry to keep you waiting but it went on much longer than expected. So I thought to try and make up we will get SEPM. You get two for the price of one. Thought we would run through the events of the day briefly and then I thought maybe Shyam Saran could tell you about the discussions on climate change that's become a big issue.

As you know, Prime Minister met with UK Prime Minister Gordon Brown at noon today. They had an extended session alone, just two of them and then they met with the delegations during which they discussed climate change. Mr Shyam Saran will tell you more in detail about that. Prime Minister also told him about our National Action Plan. He even gave him a copy. So the discussion went about trade, and Doha round and the need to prevent protectionism, and there was a discussion on the state of the world economy. Prime Minister mentioned to him the fact that whatever the green shoots of recovery there might be, are still very fragile, that most of the major indicators are still negative, when you look at the world economy as a whole.

They discussed the need to implement the decisions that were taken in the London G 20 Summit in April, where you know there was an agreement, not only on the large stimulus package for the world economy but also on increasing the financing available to international financial institution and the need to restructure them as well. Much of this still needs to be implemented. It needs to be realized in practice. There was some discussion also on the imbalances in the structure of the world economy, which many people think is one of the contributing reasons for the world economic crisis that we face today and on how surveillance regulation mechanisms would need to be improved to deal with this.

Both of them expressed satisfaction with the continuous and steady development of bilateral relations, which as you know are excellent. Our President will be visiting UK later this year, and we have a tradition of annual summits and high-level meetings. The afternoon and evening were really spent in the G5 meeting, the G8 have been meeting separately. You would have got the outcome documents. You'd have received the G5 declaration, I presume you have copies of that. There is the general declaration by G5, but there is also a declaration on trade matters. You got both of them, good. The leaders met first from 5 o'clock onwards, and had a fairly detailed and free-flowing discussion on several issues. I'll just go through the agenda with you.

To begin with, they discussed....their co-ordinated their position for the meetings tomorrow with the G8 and discussed, which issues they need to concentrate on and which they need to present. I think as some of the largest developing countries, naturally their attempt was to seek how we can ameliorate the effects of the economic crisis on the developing countries. Prime Minister made the point that the serial crises that we face, whether it is energy security or the food crisis or the liquidity problem have impacted trade credit flows. These are all interlinked, and that actually one needs to find linked solutions for all these problems. He also spoke again of the need for the decisions that had been taken at London by the G20 to be implemented and that the last thing that the developing countries can afford is for the recovery to be delayed or for the world economy to go into a stagflation if the sufficient stimulus is not provided to the global economy. If there isn't a recovery from the present situation, because the developing countries would be the least equipped to cope with the effects of the stagflation and what it might do to them. So, in fact, as PM said that the recovery must be based on an inclusive strategy of growth which takes the poor countries into account. In fact, he also spoke of the need that when devising solutions to the world economic crisis, it is essential to take into consideration, the burden of mass property, and that is something that must be addressed in the process otherwise.

You have seen estimates by the World Bank, by the IMF for the increasing number of peoples who would slip back into poverty, unless the economic crisis is addressed very quickly. Tomorrow during the discussions with the G8, there will be a discussion on the new sources of growth in the world economy. So there was some discussion around the table from where these new sources of growth would come. The feeling was that for country like ours which have a young population the challenge really is to make the poor bankable, in the sense that given their skills and jobs, they can create demand, and consumption that could would help to pull the economy forward and bring growth into economies, and that would be an enormous source of growth.

There was also considerable discussion on the need to reform international, not just financial institution, but also the institutions of international governance. This was a recurrent theme, Prime Minister spoke of it. So did President Lula, so did all the other speakers. So did the Chinese representative. President, Hu Jintao was represented by Mr. Dai Bing Guo and he also spoke of this. It also comes out very clearly in the G5 declaration as a very strong statement about the need to do that. There was some discussion, both over dinner and in the meeting, of looking at the use of alternate currencies. Not so much as reserve currencies. But Brazil's President Lula suggested that we should consider using our own currencies to settle our own trading accounts with each other. So not the earlier idea, which revolved around, the last time of reserve currency- which everyone recognised- the Chinese Foreign Minister spoke at dinner- he also said that, that is a long-term issue of global reserve currency. But there was as President Lula said, he was not proposing a new currency, but he suggested that our expert should look at the idea of settling trading accounts in our own currencies amongst ourselves within the G5. So that's one of the ideas which we looked at.

Then the Mexican President spoke about the green fund that Mexico has proposed to fund climate change, Mr Shyam Saran will talk to you about that, and the G5 agreed that they would look at the proposal in detail. Among them, basically the themes that were covered therefore, were very much the themes we can expect to come up tomorrow. There was an element of coordination of what the G. 5 would say tomorrow. And what they would be pressing for, but there was also an element of what G5 can do amongst ourselves to try and move things forward whether on technology or whether on financing the green fund, but which would also involve money from the developed countries. On each of these....and those were really the two big aspect that were discussed. I now hand you over to Mr. Shyam Saran, who will tell you about the climate change discussions both in the G5 and generally with the G8.

Shri Shyam Saran, SEPM- Thank you Shanker. Let me begin by stressing the fact that climate change is one of the major agenda items of both the G8 summit, as well as for the G5 summit. The importance of the discussion on climate change at this venue lies in the fact that we are only six months away from the Copenhagen Summit of fifteen parties, which is to take a number of informal decisions about the global regime for dealing with the challenge of climate change. The agreement among both the G5 countries and both the G8 and G5 countries has been that a very strong political message needs to go out from the Heads of State, which would give a strong fillip to the ongoing negotiations in the Copenhagen process.

Now let me begin by first stressing what our own perspective concerning these discussions are. We have been repeatedly stressing that, as far as the negotiations are concerned, these negotiations are actually taking place under the UNFCCC, that is the process which has now become known as the Copenhagen process. Therefore, whatever we do here, should not pre-empt decisions which rightfully need to be taken by the larger body under the UNFCCC process. Therefore, our role here is meeting of the political leaders, whether it is for G5 or for G5 and G8 or in the major economies forum, which is to be held tomorrow, is really to give the right kind of messages to the multilateral negotiations.

Now in that respect, the most important meeting, as far as climate change is concerned, is going to be held tomorrow and that is the energy and climate forum of the major economies, which is going to be held tomorrow afternoon. And this is a grouping of about sixteen or seventeen countries, which includes the G8 plus G5 plus a few additional countries. These additional countries are like Indonesia, Australia, you have South Korea, and of course EU is represented in that forum. For the last several months we had been engaged in coming out with a agreed declaration. Three preparatory meetings have been held. The last meeting was held in Mexico City and I am happy to report that after very very intensive negotiations the major economies Forum has in fact been able to come up with a declaration, which will be released to you tomorrow. But of course, the focus was on what is going to happen tomorrow when the G5 meet the G8 countries and what will be the position the G5 countries will take once they again go to the major economies Forum, what is our perspective on the climate change issue.

Now here, the G5 countries have a fairly co-ordinated position with respect to some of the key issues relating to climate change. One is that the G.5 countries hold the position, that while climate change is a global challenge, and that we all need to work together in order to deal with this challenge, there is an aspect of historical responsibility, which has to be taken into account, and that historical responsibility is for the developed industrialized countries because if climate change is taking place today, it is not taking place because of current emissions, but is as a result of accumulated emissions in the atmosphere which is causing climate change and that accumulation of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere is really the responsibility of the industrialized countries and therefore, on the principle of polluter pays, the major responsibility of climate change and of contributing to the global efforts to deal with the climate change is with the developed countries.

This translates into a very specific demand by the developing countries that there should be very sharp and significant reduction in the emissions of the developed countries. They should lead the G. 5 countries. If you look at the political declaration, we have stated that the developed countries emissions should be reduced by at least forty percent by the year 2020. So a very specific figure has been given, and of course we also say that this should be the basis for more even more ambitious targets which would be set for 2050, of 80-85 percent cuts by 2050. So that's a very major, in fact a very important political message from G5 that there has to be a very sharp reduction in the emissions of the developed countries and that should not be less than 40 percent by 2020.

Then we have another aspect which is very important, and that is the question of adaptation. How do we adapt to climate change? Climate change is already taking place in India, we say that we are already facing the impact of climate change and we are spending maybe 2-2.5 per cent of GDP currently, for adapting to climate change. This is, for example, to deal with extreme climatic events, which will be taking place or certain natural disasters which are taking place because of the change in the climatic patterns. We are having to spend money because agriculture is being impacted by climate. The growing season of crops has become short from what it was before. So there are many demands on the very limited resources of India itself of meeting the challenge of adaptation, and it is also a fact that even if its emissions were to become zero to-day, climate change would continue to take place because of the fact that, as I mentioned earlier, that the impact is due to the accumulation of greenhouse gases in atmosphere and not just the current emissions. So it is going to be a long-term sort of burden on developing countries to meet the challenge of adaptation and therefore we have said that in any climate change regime that we are going to be negotiating, any outcome that we are negotiating must have equal emphasis, if not greater emphasis, on adaptation as it would on mitigation, and there is need for developing countries, particularly to be enabled to deal with the challenge of adaptation.

Then we come to the other pillars, as they are called, of the climate change, and one is the financing and the other is technology, and here again the discussions which took place in the G5, it was very clear that there needs to be- number one, predictable, stable and adequate financial resources, which need to be mobilised to enable a global challenge, a global response, to emerge to the challenge of climate change. And this of course means that even the developing countries have to be enabled, whether in terms of adaptation or whether in terms of mitigation to take various actions beyond what they are already taking on. Unless there is adequate financial resources available, it would not be possible to do so. So the major developing countries have put forward a proposal that at least 0.5 per cent of the developed country GDP, or if possible even one per cent of the GDP, be somewhat the minimum amount of resources which would be required in order to finance the actions which are required for climate change.

And it is also recognized that technology is going to be a key element in dealing with climate change, and in this the developing countries position again is very clear and we say that if climate change is really the extraordinary challenge that everyone says that we are confronting, then, it stands to reason that- number one, whatever existing climate-friendly technologies, which are available to us or which are viable or close to viability, these should be diffused, in as rapid and in as widespread manner as possible. Secondly, you also would have to parallel this with a major programme for capacity building, because even if technology is there, unless there is the capacity to absorb or assimilate it, technology does not mean very much. So, if we have the rapid diffusion we are talking about, which would make an impact in terms of climate change, it also requires that there should be a major programme for capacity building. Thirdly, there is another aspect that success would depend upon how successful we are in being able to generate the kind of transformation and technologies, which are required to enable us to really make a significant shift in our strategy of development, in the package of development, which is currently based essentially on fossil fuels- to a strategy which is essentially based on a renewable sources of energy and clean sources of energy, for example, like nuclear energy. Everyone agrees that the shift has to come about, but the question is how quickly the shift can come about, and the shift can come out more quickly obviously, if technology is available and financial reserves are available, because any transition is a very costly business.

So we have also put forward this particular perspective on technology- one, diffusion of existing technology to create the global platform for collaboration, technological collaboration, which would include developed as well as developing countries so we can generate the kind of transformation technologies which are required in order to bring about that strategic shift that I spoke about.

To us this was one very important aspect, and in this context, the Prime Minister informed the heads of States and Governments of the G5 countries that India in association with the United Nations Department for Economic and Social affairs is convening a conference on climate change and technology development and transfer, which is going to be take place in New Delhi on October 22 and 23 this year.

The precise objective of this particular conference is what I mentioned to you, that in a collaborative manner bring about a development diffusion and transfer of climate-friendly technologies on a global basis. This essentially is what we discussed during the meetings.

Shankar made reference to the green fund which has been suggested by the Mexican president. Now the Green Fund is a multilateral fund, which Mexico has suggested. But the contribution to this fund would be on the basis of several criteria. For example, he has spoken about the criteria of historical responsibility. That is what is the total emissions that have gone into the atmosphere since the dawn of the industrial age by a specific country. Secondly, what is the current level of emission of countries? What is the current level of development of a country? What is the overall GDP of the country, or what is the current per capita income of the country? There would also be a certain weightage given to per capita emissions of a country. You could make clear some allowances for least developed countries or countries which are small island developing states, which are very specific examples, but the fund is to be structured in a manner that everyone contributes. That is the Mexican proposal.

Some of the ideas we like, the principle that there should be some kind of an assessed contribution by countries would be very helpful in creating a fund which is stable, creating a fund which is predictable, because it would not be subject to the vagaries of a budget decisions or market economy. But there is also the aspect of who should contribute. Of course, as you know in the UNFCCC the principle is that the financial transfers is really the responsibility of the developed countries. So this is something which needs to be discussed further and during the meeting we agreed that the Mexican side will put forward for consideration a much more detailed proposal, which we are ready to look at, but keeping in mind the principles of the UNFCCC.

Last just to mention to you that tomorrow as I said, the major economies forum will be meeting and would be coming up with a declaration and as far as we're concerned that declaration is positive, is forward-looking, but very important that it also has retained some of the principles which are very important to us. For example, while we all agree that all of us share a common responsibility in moving to a much more sustainable path..... enhanced sustainability of economic development. But the overriding priority of economic and social development, of poverty reduction, of developing country must be recognized globally. That is the basis on which we really must construct the new global regime. So, it has been a positive development that we have been able to come together and come up with a declaration which both the major developed as well as the developing countries can agree to, and tomorrow, you can have a look at the declaration. Thank you.

Question: Sir, this is about Doha Round talks. Has India made any commitment to the G-8 countries that there will be a timeline for concluding the talks?

Foreign Secretary: No, because we have not even discussed it with the G-8 yet. So far it has been a discussion within the G-5. In the preparations when we were discussing the Joint Declaration which we will do with the G-8, the G-8 themselves were not willing to put a clear timeline. There were clearly some differences among themselves as to when they expect to be able to do it. General expectation, if you need a broad sort of sense, is that 2010 will be the year when people will try and finalize it. But nobody seemed ready at that stage, in the preparatory stage, to actually put a date on it.

We will now find out tomorrow. Tomorrow is when the leaders actually meet and they will have one session in the Major Economies format, in the larger expanded format of about 20 countries. Their first hour they will spend on trade issues. So, we will answer your question really tomorrow finally.

Question: Mr. Menon, in what way, if any, is the G-5 Declaration new and significant?

Foreign Secretary: I think it is new and significant in three respects. One is it is a clear declaration at a time when we now know the shape and size of the global economic crisis. So, it suggests to you what the G-5 think are very important responses to that crisis. Secondly, you will notice it comments on all the major issues, whether it is trade, whether it is the Doha Round, whether it is a separate declaration by the G-5, whether it is climate change, whether it is restructuring of international governance in its various forms. So, for me it is important because it brings it all together, says it at an authoritative level at a time when the world has changed very drastically. If you look at it, compared to the last time the G-5 met at this level at the summit in Japan the entire global outlook was quite different from what you face today. So, this is why for me it is so important.

Question: Considering the statement made by the G-5 leaders today ... the Mexican President .....(inaudible).... and your insistence that the historical ... (inaudible).... Do you see an agreement by developed countries ... If you do not see that, tomorrow are there going to be two statements or one statement on the issue?

SEPM: As I mentioned, we already have an agreed statement of the Major Economies Forum which we have already finalized. That particular declaration is going to be issued tomorrow at the end of the Major Economies Forum. So, the basic understanding has already been arrived at. What will happen tomorrow is that the leaders will in a very informal atmosphere be able to exchange a lot of views concerning how to take the process forward particularly in respect to the Copenhagen Process. With regard to whether or not the developed countries recognize historical responsibilities, it is not really a question of whether they recognize it or not because this is part of a consensus treaty. The UN Framework Convention on Climate Change has a very clear acknowledgement by the developed countries that they bear a historical responsibility for the accumulated greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. Sometimes there is, I think a misunderstanding that these are demands being put by developing countries to the developed countries. That is not the case. What developing countries are really saying is that whatever commitments you have freely undertaken in an international treaty, you should deliver that. So, historical responsibility is not a demand of the developing countries on the developed countries. Rather it is a demand that commitments that you have undertaken in the UNFCCC, you should deliver.

Question: Do you see an agreement as far as the G-8 countries are concerned?

SEPM: As you know, we have not come to the end of those negotiations because the negotiations will go on till December this year. So, we are still currently in the stage of really exchanging views, trying to see what we can come up with. There is a recognition that there has to be fairly large financial resources which will be required for transfer to developing countries, if there is to be a successful outcome at Copenhagen. But what the extent of that funding would be, in what manner it would be raised, in what manner it would be deployed, these are issues which are still not resolved.

Question: We have been told that China and India might have agreed to some binding terms in the agreement ... tomorrow. Could you shed some light on that? ... 2050 target in .....(inaudible)....

SEPM: India and China, or for that matter other developing countries in the Major Economies Forum, have not agreed to any binding targets for themselves. What the developing countries have stated is that they are in any case committed, under the UNFCCC, to a path of sustainable development. If you see much of the actions which are already being taken by the developing countries - whether it is India or whether it is China or Brazil - you will see that a considerable amount of effort is going into in fact putting in place sustainable development policies. The question is if you have to do more, how are you going to be able to support that? For that, therefore, we say that developing countries are committed to a deviation from business-as-usual provided that deviation from business-as-usual is supported by adequate finance, technology, and capacity-building. So, that particular position remains the same. There is no difference as far as that position is concerned.

As far as I am aware, there are no individual targets or even group targets for either the developed or the developing countries. As I stated earlier, we insisted that there should be ambitious targets for 2020. That is because unless you have ambitious targets for 2020 how credible would any target be for 2050? But there is no willingness at this point of time by the developed countries to indicate what they are willing to sign on to with respect to 2020.

The other point is the base year. We say the base year should be as it is in the UNFCCC and the Kyoto Protocol which is 1990. Some of the developed countries are trying to change that base year which does not seem to be very ...(inaudible)... to us.

Question: Sir, Mr. Hu Jintao could not stay for these discussions. Are you disappointed that he, a senior leader, could not stay? What could he have perhaps brought to these discussions that we perhaps missed out on?

Foreign Secretary: This is for him to decide where he goes. But China participated actively in the meetings. Mr. Dai Bingguo was there as their representative. They have been involved in all the preparations and they will be there tomorrow as well. We look forward to continuing to working with China in this process, both within the G-5 and in our discussions with G-8.

Question: Mr. Saran, can you tell us very if that India will ever agree under certain terms and conditions for a certain specific year for carbon emissions deadline? G-8 declaration today also mentioned about this. You were just now saying that it is not there but it is there for the developing countries. So, I just want to understand again. Will India ever agree or not for a specific year deadline.

Special Envoy: India agrees that both for developed as well as for developing countries at some point there has to be a peak and then emissions should come down. We also agree, and everybody agrees in fact, that the peaking will be much earlier for developed countries and they will be much later for developing countries. Where it will peak and how substantially it would go down, as I mentioned, depends upon whether or not the financial, technological and capacity-building support is available. Obviously, if sufficient support is available you can peak earlier and you can go down more significantly. If that support is not available, then the peaking cannot be very early nor can the deviations from the business-as-usual be as sharp as it would otherwise be. So, to ask India or any other developing countries to indicate a peak without there being any clarity about what is the level of support which may be available is really not very reasonable.

Question: India in any policy paper has not mentioned any such .....(inaudible)....

Foreign Secretary: We have made it quite clear that our per capita emissions will not exceed the average of the industrialized countries at any point. We have said that. But the rest is dynamic until you ...(inaudible)....

Question: Mr. Menon, do you think today's meeting of G-5 is a kind of an event when you feel that a certain identity-based agenda of G-8 is consolidated now because of today's developments? How far G-5 has gone on the global stage? There are too many groupings. So, it has become mode level or it is on plateau? How will you view today's events?

Foreign Secretary: I think the relevance of the G-5 comes from the fact that large developing countries have a certain congruence of their economic and other interests. I think that is where the relevance comes from. In today's situation where the world is in an economic crisis and certainly the uncertainty in the international system is so high, that relevance increases. So, the higher the uncertainty in the international system, the more relevant groupings like this are. We do have a large degree of congruence among ourselves. We have issued common position papers. We have agreed for five years now you see on the big issues of the day, whether it is climate change, whether it is energy security. On each of these issues we speak with a common voice. So, to me that is the relevance of it. If you ask how far does G-5 have an identity, really the answer to that is please look at what we say, look at what we do together, look at what we represent as a group. Certainly, today it is much more relevant than it was five years ago when it first started.

Question: India has been advocating restructuring of the International Institutions of Governance and UN reforms. Was this topic covered during the deliberations today and what was the progress?

Foreign Secretary: It was covered both in the discussions in the G-5 and also, you will notice, there is very a strong endorsement of the idea of a restructuring of the Institutions of International Governance in the G-5 declaration which was adopted by the leaders. In the discussions, every single member of the G-5 spoke of the need for restructuring not only of the International Financial Institutions which is what the G-20 had agreed to because they were concentrating on the economic crisis and how to get out of that but also for the UN Security Council and for other Institutions of International Governance. If you look at the declaration, there is a very strong statement there. Every one of them spoke of the need to do this.

Question: In the G-5 declaration there is a call for a new Comprehensive UN Convention on Terrorism. Could you elaborate on that?

Foreign Secretary: We have been discussing in the UN now for some time, I think eight years or so, the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism. Everybody is agreed, I think across the board, that there is the need for one comprehensive international legal instrument which enables us to deal with this phenomenon of international terrorism. But the devil is in the detail, actually in some of the definitional problems, also in some of the exemptions as to what qualifies as terrorism. This is something that is being negotiated in the UN in New York now for eight years. We think we are getting very close to an agreed definition. But I do not want to get ahead of ourselves here. You will notice, the G-5 of course endorsed the idea and said we need to do it. But we are talking to the other major groups in the UN. It is our hope that this convention - which everybody agrees we need, everybody feels would be useful - we can actually get done together within the next year or so.

Question: Coming back to the Doha Round question, what is our position? Are we ready to work on the 2010 timeframe in mind? The second question relates to the conversation PM had with Mr. Gordon Brown. You spoke about PM's assessment. What was Mr. Brown's own assessment ...?

Foreign Secretary: Of what?

Question: Of whether the situation still continues to be fragile or how the recoveries were?

Foreign Secretary: On the first question, our position on Doha Round is clear. We as India have an interest in a predictable, rule-based system for international trade. We feel it is essential especially at a time when the temptation to be protectionist might be very strong in the middle of a crisis, that the entire world actually re-commits itself to an open international trading system; and the Doha Round and the successful conclusion of the Doha Round would be one way of doing so. The terms of reference of the Doha Round are also quite clear. It is a development round; and it is supposed to be of assistance to the developing countries. So, on these terms we are united, and we are very happy to move forward on those terms, on the agreed terms. Whether this happens in 2009, 2010, 2011, we cannot predict. We are ready to do it as long as we are true to its mandate and it does actually do what it is promising to do. We have discussed this before, how important it is at this particular time for the world to take a stand against protectionism and to prevent any kind of lapse. So, this is where it becomes more important today that we move this process forward.

On Mr. Brown, I think Mr. Brown did not disagree. He did not say, "No, this is my analysis." He did not disagree. But frankly he did not give us a clear idea of this is where he sees the world economy is going. But I got the sense that he agreed that yes, it was fragile and that certainly that some stimulus is still required, and that it will be dangerous to start rolling back these steps too early.

Question: On the issue of restructuring of institutions of international governance, there is this problem with China regarding accommodation of India in the Security Council. Did that come up for discussion?

Foreign Secretary: China is a member of the G-5. China adhered fully to the declaration. Read the declaration.

Question: Do you see that as a change in China's position?

Foreign Secretary: No, I do not. China accepts also that these institutions need to be restructured and has said so herself.

Question: Does that mean we can say that China ...(inaudible)....

Foreign Secretary: Do not put words in my mouth.

Question: If one were to analyze the statements made by the five Heads of Government today, the tone of the Mexican President and the Brazilian President was strident; our Prime Minister was quite moderate in the way he actually made his statement; South Africa was almost not there; and China was not interested. Actually it appeared like a developed country over there.

Foreign Secretary: This is your opinion. You do not expect me to comment on other Heads of State and Government and what they say or do.

Question: Do you see a difference in tenor, in the way these countries have ...

Foreign Secretary: I am not going to comment. You know I would not.

Question: Did Pakistan figure in the discussion with Mr. Brown?

Foreign Secretary: Not that I know of, unless it happened when they were alone. It is possible. I told you what I heard.

Question: In Pakistan today actually Mr. Zardari admitted that they had nurtured terrorism for their own strategic interests*.

Foreign Secretary: That was yesterday's interview.

Question: Now that they have admitted ...

Foreign Secretary: What else. Please read the rest of what he said. He said it is no longer so and nobody makes that mistake any more. Please read the rest of that statement.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

080. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary and Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change during the G-8 Summit.

L'Aquila (Italy), July 9, 2009.

Foreign Secretary (Mr. Shivshankar Menon): Since it is now almost 7:30 pm, I thought we would give you a run down on what happened today.

As you know, we started today with the meeting of the G-8 plus the G-5 and Egypt. The leaders at 10 am in the morning session actually discussed global issues, development policy. That was the main theme. After welcoming the G-5, Prime Minister Berlusconi mentioned to them what the G-8 had discussed the day before. After that he also pointed to the Joint Declaration that the sherpas of both the G-5 and G-8 had drawn up for the first time. He mentioned that this was a step forward where for the first time now in this Summit both the G-8 and G-5 were sitting and meeting for a considerable length of time. It was not just two hours of special session; it was all series of meetings. In fact, all of today they have been together and will be together tomorrow as well when the African countries join them. Then he gave the floor to the various G-5 and Egypt members who had just come to the meeting.

One of the issues that he raised was when he listed the issues at the beginning he listed global economic crisis, recovery, how to find sources of growth for the economy. He also spoke of the global warming and climate change as one of the big issues. Then he said that between the G-8 and the G-5 together - the G-14 is the word he used - we represent about 80 per cent of the world economy. He said that we might consider whether or not we should consider this a stable format for the future. Having outlined these issues, he then threw it open to a discussion.

There were certain common features to what India, Brazil, South Africa, Mexico, Egypt and all. They all pointed out that the economic crisis facing the world today did not originate in the developing world; was not caused by us; but that the effects on the developing world and developing countries are really quite extreme; and that it is, therefore, important that we all take a coordinated approach. All of us spoke, PM as well, about the G-20 having taken good decisions in London but that there was an implementation issue which needs to be followed up before the next G-20 meeting in Pittsburg which will be in September, to which the US has invited all the G-20 members to come.

On the crisis itself, there was some discussion of what had been agreed in the G-20 but all the developing countries spoke very strongly of the need to resist protectionism. In this there was actually no distinction between what the members of the G-5 and the G-8 said. There was a common thread running through that the standstill agreement so far had not been reached in any way which threatened the international trading system, but certainly there had been regression from the standstill agreement, the agreement in London, not to have any fresh protectionist measures. There is a general feeling that this could be the most dangerous thing possible that it would prevent a recovery and would be very dangerous, if there were a return to protectionism.

The President of Brazil spoke about the idea of a G-14 and said that there is a need to review the entire question of global governance, it is not only just the G-20 or the G-14 or which of these. This was a theme that ran through the meeting in the morning, and at lunch there was considerable discussion on this, on global governance and how it needs to be restructured. The end result of that discussion, because most people felt that you do need to work with these structures, was that the G-20 is a good forum to do the financial, the economic issues, purely finance, Finance Ministers have developed the expertise over time to do that. But broader global governance issues, or what one might call political issues, other issues, are probably better dealt with in other fora. There was no conclusion that this has to be done in a G-14. There was no such conclusion.

As I said, this is an informal discussion forum where leaders can air their views, they share their opinions and then opinion forms, just like when the G-5 was first invited to such a summit five years ago. It was a very brief participation. It was more as an outreach. Now it is an actual discussion together of topics. But this thread ran right through of how we shape global governance to deal with the new situation today and to reflect current realities. You will see it in all the declarations.

There was mention not just of the G-20, of the G-40 but also of the MEF itself, of the need to reform UN structures at lunch especially because UN Secretary-General was there and so were the heads of the ILO, the WTO, the IMF, and the World Bank. There was a lot of talk of how they need to be restructured. The international financial institutions they said will be restructuring over the next two years. In fact, by 2012 they are supposed to restructure voting shares in the World Bank and the IMF. There was also talk of the UN Security Council. But, as I said, this was not a conclusive discussion nor was anything settled, nor was all that what was agreed is in the communiqués which you have seen already. But there was a considerable sense that global governance cannot go on the way it was in today's situation. There were several alternatives mentioned. One of the strongest supporters of this idea of the G-14 which deals with larger governance issues was President Sarkozy actually in this meeting.

The Prime Minister spoke also in some detail about how to get the global economy going. President Obama said that the world will not go back to what it was before the crisis hit; that US consumers will change their habits; that the kind of excessive consumption which was fed by the rest of the world and actually helped to create growth in the rest of the world is unlikely to return any time soon. So, there was some discussion about the alternative sources of growth, where to look for growth in the world economy over the years to come, and what kind of new equilibrium to look at.

Prime Minister made the point that economies like India, even though they might be poor, have a savings rate of 35 per cent, an investment rate of 37 per cent, and are basically domestically driven. Of course, each country will do what it can to generate its own domestic recovery through stimulus packages. He also said that in order to make this sustainable and to make recovery, make the sources of demand to substitute for what was a support of international environment in the past, it is very important that the poor, the young should be empowered and - he used the same phrase that he used yesterday - be made bankable in a sense. He said, if they are trained, if they have the skills, if they are educated, if they have the jobs, then you create this virtual cycle where they themselves the consumption which drives the economy; and that the time has come to look at putting the poor first in development policies and in giving them the skills and the tools, this would lead to a much more sustained and sustainable growth proposition than what there was before. He also spoke about the dangers of protectionism and so on.

Towards the end of the discussion, President Obama also briefed the meeting about his plans to hold a nuclear security summit next year. He said he would be giving more details to the countries which were around the table. He said they were all invited to that. He also spoke about the US assessment of where the recovery process is. He said that certainly there is much greater stability in the financial markets than was expected in April at the G-20 meetings, and the banks have been recapitalized. But there are still weaknesses in the US and the global economy, he said, which we will need to deal with and over the long run we will have to look at stabilizers for job losses and so on which have already taken place, and look at how to boost demand in the global economy. As I said, that was part of the discussion - where to look for growth. Some of the European members spoke of using climate change, green industries, as a driver for growth creating a whole new industry and of using technology and climate change financing to try and generate growth in the global economy.

Formally speaking, the lunch was supposed to be the discussion of future sources of growth. Much of it had already happened in the morning. So, when they came to lunch actually there were differing estimates of when exactly recovery would happen. Some said it is not imminent, some said end of this year or early next year. So, obviously each country depending on their own situation had their own view of how it was going. Then there was a considerable discussion on how the international organizations need to be restructured to try and help to deal with these issues - with food security, energy security, recovery of growth - and to say that as presently structured they not only do not reflect where growth would come from, but they also do not have the capacity to actually monitor what is happening in the world economy. So, there were some suggestions. Some of the European members said that the IMF's surveillance needs to be strengthened. This is a point that PM had made actually in the Washington G-20 summit that the IMF's surveillance of the world economy has to be much more efficient so that we see the warning signs of what is happening much quicker, and that leaders then have some warning before this happens.

In the afternoon, there was a meeting of the major economies. They first met for about forty minutes where they discussed the Doha Round and trade, and reconfirmed their commitment to fighting protectionism. Many of the speakers spoke of the credibility of leadership itself because the Doha Round has now taken so long, almost nine years, of negotiation. It was decided to start a process of negotiating in the hope of concluding the Round in 2010. This was followed by a considerable discussion in the same forum, the larger MEF forum, with the addition of Denmark because they are the hosts of the Copenhagen Conference on Climate Change. That I will leave to Shyam to tell you about.

In terms of bilateral pull-asides, Prime Minister had a bilateral meeting with Chancellor Merkel. During the meeting, while they were in the same room, he had pull-asides with Prime Minister Rudd of Australia, with President Obama of the US. They spent considerable time. He spoke to Mr. Sarkozy and also to Mr. Medvedev. They covered the bilateral relationship and of how we plan to take it forward. He had a good conversation with President Obama. Both of them spoke of Secretary of State Clinton's visit to India later this month. They also discussed the situation in the region and how we want to take our bilateral relationship to an enhanced level of partnership and the kinds of elements that we are looking at, that we are working on as we lead up to the Clinton visit.

I will leave climate change to Shyam.

Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change (Mr. Shyam Saran):

I presume that all of you have a copy of the MEF Declaration. This declaration has now been formally adopted by the Major Economies Forum, which was the last meeting that was held today. I will start by giving you some background to this particular document and then get on to what exactly happened during the MEF meeting itself.

This particular declaration is, as I mentioned to you earlier, in the nature of a political document whose objective is to try and give a major impetus to the negotiations that are taking place under the UNFCCC. If you look at the Declaration, it in fact follows very much the kind of language that we have had, for example in Hokkaido during the last G-8 plus G-5 Summit, but there are a few new elements which I would like draw attention to. In the negotiations that we were having on this declaration, as you would expect perhaps the most difficult paragraph was the one on mitigation, which is paragraph one. Here, essentially what developing countries like India, China, Brazil, and South Africa were stressing was that while it is very worthwhile to talk about a long-term goal for 2050 - and we of course welcome the fact that developed countries are willing to sign on to 80 per cent or 85 per cent reduction in their emissions by that time - for this to be credible, it was very important that there should be very ambitious and robust emission reduction targets for the interim period also, that is, for 2020; that if particular figure was not there, then to talk about something for 2050 would not really be very credible to the international community.

Sometimes I think an issue is raised that the developing countries were not willing to sign on to a more ambitious document. But the fact is that that was a very big sticking point that we said that we need to see a very credible mid-term target. As you know, the developing countries themselves have put forward a proposal that there should be at least 40 per cent reduction in the emissions of the developed countries by 2020.

Again, a question was raised that we have to be pragmatic; we would need to follow science. We agree with that. But we also believe that one needs to be, therefore, consistent throughout because science is also saying that unless you make 25 to 40 per cent cut in your developed country emissions by 2020, we may not be able to avoid irreversible climate change. So, in terms of the science again it is very important that there should be interim targets. We were not able to get a figure for the interim targets, which is the reason why that particular aspect has been in fact left open.

It was important to give you this background because I think that there has been some misunderstanding about developing country positions with regard to climate change action. One very important step forward is the recognition that there should be every effort made to keep temperature rise within two degrees centigrade by 2050. That is something new. We do not regard this as an arithmetical target; we regard this as a political decision because, as you know, there is a great deal of uncertainty with respect to what would be the actual rise in temperature which may take place, what would be the consequences of that rise of temperature. The IPCC itself has in fact stated very clearly that there is an uncertainty about this. But nevertheless we believe that it is worthwhile, in recognition of the IPCC report, reflecting this as something which we should aspire towards. That is an important step forward in this particular document.

The other aspect which is worthwhile looking at is that we have also a much stronger paragraph here on technology partnership. This I regard as one of the more important forward-looking results of this particular summit because here we have a clear recognition that technology is going to be a very key component of our fight against climate change; and that we should create a platform where not only do we come together to diffuse climate-friendly technologies, but much more important, can we also work together on a platform to create transformational technologies for the future.

As you will notice here we have in the section on technology there are some very specific projects which have been identified. These include solar energy, smart grids, carbon capture, use and storage, advanced vehicles, high efficiency and lower emission cold technologies; this is something in fact which India had recommended. There are a number of very specific projects on which there is now agreement amongst the major economies to work together. That is an important positive outcome.

On financial resources, while there is recognition that no Copenhagen outcome will be successful unless there is a considerable amount of resources which are mobilized for meeting the requirements of developing countries, not only for the mitigation action but also for adaptation, there would not be a successful outcome. So, while the need is recognized, the document itself does not go into any great detail as to how these resources are to be mobilized, but it does mention possible sources including public sources, including market mechanisms. So, this is something which will need to be obviously fleshed out. The only specific reference here which has been made is to the Green Fund proposal of Mexico and I will have something more to say about that.

But in sum, we believe that given the current state of negotiations what we have been able to achieve in this declaration is a forward-looking document. It does represent an advance, a positive advance, on what we have been able to agree upon in the past. Will it give a fillip to the negotiations? I think it will, modest as it may be.

Now let me come to the MEF meeting itself. The meeting was opened by President Obama. He very much emphasized the importance of action on climate change as being one of the main challenges that is facing us. He said that we need to do all that we can as leaders of the major economies to give a major political push to the negotiations. So, he recognized that this is not the negotiating forum. It is important that that particular point has been acknowledged because this is something which we have been saying all the time that the negotiations are to take place in the multilateral forum.

In terms of what could be the political message which would emerge from the Major Economies Forum, he said there are three or four things that we need to do. One is, it is extremely important that we should come out clearly with a long-term aspiration goal. He also acknowledged that coupled with this there is need to also come out with very clear intermediate course. So, that particular aspect which we have been talking about has been recognized. He also said that we acknowledge that there is a historical responsibility and that whatever package that comes out from Copenhagen must take this fact into account. That is an important element.

Secondly, he also said that between now and Copenhagen we need to find how we are going to mobilize the very large amount of financial resources which would be required, and what would be the possible sources for these financial resources. Not much clarity on that yet, but something that we need to look at. In this context he mentioned two proposals on finance.

One was the Green Fund proposal of Mexico, and the other was the proposal which has been made by Gordon Brown of the UK on how perhaps by 2020 a sum of 100 million dollars could be raised using both private as well as market sources of finance.

Lastly, he said that obviously we need to take into account the fact that while the lead has to be taken in terms of mitigation by the developed countries, unless there is also a contribution made by developing countries whose emissions are likely to rise much faster in a business-as-usual scenario, we may not be able to really tackle the challenge of climate change. So, this is a reality which has to be faced. This is basically his opening remarks.

After that we had a number of interventions. I may not go into much detail but I would like to mention here the Green Fund proposal of Mexico because the President of Mexico explained this in some considerable detail. The key points in the Mexican proposal are - which we believe are positive - he says that if you want predictable and stable sources of finance, one of the best ways to ensure that is an assessment principle. That is, if there are assessed contributions of various countries, this could provide a predictable source of finance and that is a principle we agree with.

On the question of what should be the basis of this assessment, again there are elements which have been mentioned by the Mexican President which also seemed quite attractive to us. For example he has mentioned that the element of historical responsibility should be taken into account. The overall emissions of different countries, the total volume of emissions should be another factor. Individual per capita emissions could also be taken into account. There could be also some weight given to the overall GDP of a country or the per capita income of a country. Perhaps you could have some special arrangement for least developed countries or the small island developing states. Again we have problem there. I think the two areas where we need some further clarity is, what is the weight which is going to be given to each of these criteria, and do the other countries agree with these criteria which have been mentioned.

In the discussions that we have had so far, there has been some cherry-picking that maybe this particular criteria is more important, another criteria is less important. So, we need to have a total picture as to what is the weightage which is going to be given to the different criteria. The other element is that this assessment principle as the Mexicans see it will apply to all countries; that the division that we regard as fundamental in the UNFCC between developed and developing countries that particular principle is in a sense being set aside here. That has its own implications. This is something which will require a very careful consideration not only just by India but by all the developing countries in the negotiations. So, what we have agreed to do is to look at this proposal and discuss this further.

The UK proposal is, of course, mainly drawing the funding from market mechanisms, that is, the setting up of and the expansion of carbon markets and some proportion of those carbon market proceeds then being made available for developing countries. There is some role given to public finance but only a limited role, a limited role in terms of meeting the requirements of the least developed countries, meeting the requirements of small island developing states. But in fact very little has been said about the adaptation needs of other developing countries. So, there are many questions of that nature which arise from this.

We had also a presentation by the Australian Prime Minister mainly on the issue of carbon capture and storage. As you know, Australia has taken the lead in setting up an institute for carbon capture and storage in Australia. We have also agreed that this is an initiative where we can be an active participant although we have, of course, serious doubts about the applicability of a CCS in a country like India. But he has made this proposal inviting all the countries to join in this particular initiative and this is something again which we are willing to look at. This is essentially the sort of presentations which came from mostly developed country partners.

Prime Minister Singh made a statement* in which he did respond to some of the issues which were raised by the other speakers. In the intervention that he made, he praised President Obama for making very explicit the link between energy and climate. As you know, this forum itself is called

* The Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in his remarks apprised the leaders of MEF what India was doing to combat climate change with an ambitious National Action Plan and assured them that it would work with other countries for the successful conclusion of the negotiations at Copenhagen. He said the challenge was to change the pattern of economic development based on fossil fuels to one supported by clean and renewable sources of energy and that the debate needed to address this link. He was not willing to entertain the thought that the developing countries were complacent or were not interested in addressing the consequences of climate change, despite the fact they were the ones most impacted and were already facing the consequences of climate change. He insisted that the developing countries had a much greater interest in the issue than the developed nations. He drew attention to the India's ambitious National Action Plan that had set a goal of cutting emissions by 20 per cent in its 11th Plan. The country was committed to sustainable development but for up-scaling it, the creation of an enabling international regime was necessary the Energy and Climate Forum of the Major Economies. In short, of course, it is known as the Major Economies Forum. He said that really energy and climate are two sides of the same coin. That should be fairly self-evident; sometimes it is not. But if we wish to bring about a change in the pattern of economic development, economic activity from what it is currently, based essentially on fossil fuels, to one which is based on renewables and cleaner sources of energy, then unless the issue of energy security is addressed, how you really move towards dealing with climate change. So, it is extremely important that this particular link between the two should be recognized. So, he welcomed the fact that this particular link was established very clearly.

He also stated the point that we as developing countries have a much greater interest in action on climate change because we are the ones who are most impacted by it. The notion that somehow developing countries are less serious about climate change, or the notion that we are complacent about climate change, nothing could be further from the truth because we are the ones who are going to be impacted most. Therefore, if there are countries who have a maximum interest in a successful outcome at Copenhagen, it is countries like India. So, he set at rest that particular notion.

Secondly, he said what is it that we need to put in place in terms of this outcome at Copenhagen. Here he said, of course we recognize that this is a common challenge; of course we recognize that we have to do whatever we can as developing countries in order to address the issue of climate change; but there has to be a recognition that action on climate change cannot be built upon the perpetuation of poverty. So, this is a fundamental issue because it does impact on our developmental prospects. He hastened to add that we in India have done a great deal on our own without any assistance from embedding both equity and international responsibility, the prime minister said. He assured his audience that India would do whatever it could to meet the challenge during the negotiations at Copenhagen, but warned that action on climate change could not be built upon the perpetuation of poverty. Therefore it was essential that the agreement at Copenhagen to be "ambitious, comprehensive but, above all, equitable." On the question of emission reductions, the Prime Minister while conceding that very ambitious targets were needed for 2050 called upon the industrial nations to commit themselves to an interim target of cutting their emissions by 40 per cent by 2020. He assured that India was willing to diverge from business as usual and move to a climate friendly path of development. It would be willing to do more if new technologies and funding were made available. The prime minister also spoke on the challenges of the developing countries in adapting themselves to the consequences of climate change. Pointing out that India was already spending 2 to 2.5 per cent of its GDP annually on meeting the consequences of outside, whether it is in terms of improving energy efficiency, a target of 20 per cent increase in energy efficiency in the Eleventh Five-Year Plan, we have put in place very ambitious national action plan on climate change which includes a great deal of action on solar energy, on use of other renewable sources of energy. We have ourselves committed India to a path of sustainable development. So, we will do whatever we can within the limitation of our resources. But what we really need is the creation of a supportive international climate regime which will enable us to enhance, which will enable us to upscale whatever efforts we are nationally making. That is really the expectation that we have from what must emerge from Copenhagen.

In this, of course, is embedded the issue of equity. Equity means that there should be an acknowledgement by developed countries of their historical responsibility. So, the outcome in Copenhagen must be ambitious; must be very comprehensive because it must include all the different elements which have been identified; but above all it must be equitable. So, the principle that every citizen of this globe has an equal entitlement to the global atmospheric space is something which must be recognized.

In this context, Prime Minister also talked about the emission reduction targets. He did say that while we need to have very ambitious targets for 2050, it is as I mentioned earlier very important that they must be backed by credible and also ambitious targets for the interim. In that context he did mention that at least 40 per cent reduction in current emissions of the developed countries would indicate that level of credibility.

With regard to what countries like India would be prepared to do, we have already indicated our willingness to diverge further from business-as-usual.

extreme climatic conditions and calamities, but such uncompensated burden will only increase over time on the developing countries. To ensure the success of the outcome at Copenhagen it was necessary that adaptation was equally addressed.

A few days later on July 17 speaking at the Consultative Dialogue on "India's Climate Responsive Roadmap for Development" organized by Oneworld Foundation in New Delhi the Special Envoy Shyam Saran allaying fears that India had diluted its stand on the climate change at the G-8 meeting by accepting carbon emission caps, said India's position remained unchanged and the lead in checking emissions had to be taken by the developed countries. India, he said, would do whatever it could within the limitations of the available resources. "There can be no contradiction between poverty alleviation, economic and social development and climate change." India was committed to an "ecologically sustainable growth path." Mr. Saran pointed out that while India's economy was growing at 8 to 9 per cent annually the energy consumption was less than 4 per cent. Taking a

In fact Prime Minister said that the actions that we are taking are already leading us to a diversion from business-as-usual and we will be able to do more provided supportive financial resources, technology transfer is made available.

President Obama asked the Prime Minister to say a few words specifically on adaptation. Here Prime Minister made the point that while the focus is on mitigation we must not forget that adaptation is an equal challenge, if not even a bigger challenge. Therefore, any action on climate change must take the aspect of adaptation into account. He mentioned that if you are looking at the future, even if emissions were drastically reduced in the near future, climate change will continue to take place because it is taking place not because of current emissions but it is taking place because of accumulated greenhouse gas emissions in the atmosphere. So, that will only come down gradually. In the meantime the impact on climate will continue and the maximum adverse impact will be on developing countries like India. He pointed out that in India itself we are currently spending about two per cent to 2.5 per cent of our GDP on adaptation because we are already facing extreme climatic events. We are facing national disasters which are traced to changes in climatic patterns. There is impact even in urban areas. As you know, there is flooding. The storm drainage systems are being overwhelmed by very heavy incessant rain. These are things which are a reality to us already. This uncompensated burden on us is going to only increase. So, unless there is recognition of this challenge of adaptation - which is almost equal to, if not more, with regard to mitigation - we will not be able to get a very successful outcome at Copenhagen.

cue from the Prime Minister, Saran pointed out that the National Action Plan on Climate Change had focused on renewable sources of energy and a solar energy document was also almost ready. The massive increase in forest area from 22 percent now, to 33 percent would greatly help in that direction. An additional 6 million hectare of degraded forest would be revived and this would act as a carbon sink, he said.

He hoped that a "comprehensive, balanced and equitable" outcome at the upcoming Copenhagen conference should satisfy the world and be relevant to the people. While adaptation was a great challenge for a country like India, mitigation, finance and technology were the four components that were to be addressed. "We need technological and financial support from the developed countries," he said while hoping that these challenges would be overcome by the time Copenhagen happened. "We are making a slow progress, but we are moving towards an understanding."

He also made a comment on the proposals which were made by Gordon Brown and President Calderon. I have already mentioned to you Prime Minister's willingness to look at the proposal but making the point that this would, as currently formulated, go against the UNFCCC principle of a clear divide between developed country obligations and developing country obligations. But we have said that we will look at this.

On Prime Minister Brown's proposal, while Prime Minister welcomed the fact that a figure had been put on the table, he did say that how the fund is constituted is going to be very important. The reliance on market mechanism is something that we have some reservations about. That is because there can be changes in the market conditions. He pointed out to the fact that only recently in the wake of the economic and financial crisis the price of carbon in the European market fell from something like 30 Euros to less than 10 Euros. Even now it is only about 13 or 14 Euros. On the basis of this kind of volatile market it may be very difficult to get the kind of predictable, stable resources that are required to enable countries to do long-term planning on climate change. So, he did mention that we need to perhaps look at this aspect a little more carefully in the ensuing months.

It was agreed that work continues in the Major Economies Forum. President Obama has said that he will come up with ideas with regard to how the work could be continued. Of course, we look forward to receiving proposals in that respect.

I think I have covered more or less everything. Thank you very much.

Question: Could you please confirm if India is willing to host MEF Ministerial meeting in September this year?

Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change: The only conference that we are holding with respect to climate change is a meeting in October - 22nd and 23rd October - which is on climate change, technology development and transfer.

Foreign Secretary: I think he means the meeting of Trade Ministers which is going to be held in early September, the meeting of a group of Trade Ministers to discuss how to get the Doha Round negotiations started. That is probably the one that you are referring to.

Question: Will it be in Delhi?

Foreign Secretary: Location is not decided. It will be in India in September.

* * * * *

Question: This ...(Unclear)... Doha Round talks ...(Unclear)... in Pittsburg in 2010. Will it be the first half or the second half? Anything specific?

Foreign Secretary: No, I do not think so. I think until they get the negotiations going again they ...(Unclear)... It also depends on how comfortable they are at home. Each one will have to work with their own industry.

Question: The G-8 plus G-5 Joint Statement took more than the expected time today. Was there any dispute?

Foreign Secretary: No, none at all. What you have is what was done earlier. Maybe it is just photocopying machine. I do not know.

Question: Most of the Joint Statement was ...(Unclear)...

Foreign Secretary: Thank you. Frankly, we are dealing with the same issues here. We are dealing with climate change; we are dealing with restructuring of international organizations; we are dealing with recovery from global crisis. So, it is not as though we will cover completely different topics. Some difference in emphasis you will see.

Question: Some of the international media agencies, particularly ...(Unclear)... talked about differences, even differences between G-8 and Russia ...(Unclear)... on climate change. A reference has been made that Russia has been differing with the rest of the G-8 countries.

Foreign Secretary: I think make up your own mind. Read the documents yourself. You have heard us. We have told you in great detail what happened. Make up your own mind. There is a lot of spin going on. I find the international channels are busy saying developing countries refused. Where did we refuse? In fact, you have just heard how there has been progress. So, do not go by what other people say. You make up your own mind. You have been told in great detail. You have the documents yourselves.

Question: The Statement is more or less what you have been saying.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you.

Question: This is on climate change again. ...(Unclear)... One of the major points that you were all trying to make was that you really needed strong interim targets for the developed nations and that was one reason why you did not feel that you could agree to anything concrete particularly for 2050 until you have had interim targets from the developed countries. Is that what you were saying?

Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change: What we said was we would need to be convinced that there is a credible pathway. So, whatever is put forward for 2050 must be backed by credible interim targets. It was not a question of agreeing or disagreeing with a particular figure, but pointing out that we have to carry credibility with the international community. We also would be signing on to that document and so our credibility is also important. So, we need to be able to convince the international community that we are really looking at a realistic pathway which is backed by not only ambitious targets for 2050 but shows how we are going to get to it. To our mind, supported by science 40 per cent reduction by 2020 is really what is required.

Question: One of the major stalemates for Doha Round of talks was between India and the US. So, what must have provoked ...

Foreign Secretary: We do not think that we were the cause of the stalemate. Yes, we were not happy with the state of the negotiations at that time. We still did not have enough in there for us to agree. But neither did some of the others. So, it is not an India-US negotiation.

Question: No, of course, not. India was kind of representing the developing countries.

Foreign Secretary: No, I think we had issues with where it was. But you will notice from the documents it is quite clear. What we are all saying is that the 6th December documents on NAMA, on agriculture, we need to use as a basis to carry the negotiations forward. On services we still expect more which is why a negotiation is necessary in all three of these big areas. It is not as though everything was settled or everything is ready. So, we will have a meeting in September which will start up the process and there will be discussions, whether bilateral or in Geneva through the WTO.

Question: The last paragraph of the joint statement talks about commitment to advance reform processes in international organizations. We saw the PM speak about this as well. Are you satisfied with the statement that has come out? Is there future scope for more reform? What is the status?

Foreign Secretary: I think it is important that this group of countries - 14 countries and important countries if you look at the membership of this group - actually could make such an unequivocal statement. For me the other impressive thing - and this is partly a result of the economic crisis of the changed situation in the world today - is that there is broad recognition that we really need to work these institutions, we need to change them. There is already a commitment to change the international financial institutions and to restructure them, to change the voting shares, to do that at the G-20 in London. You will see this is a much longer list. In fact, there were other countries who wanted to add more and more but we said a general reference is good enough. You do not need five pages of names of sixty odd international organizations. Apparently there are more than sixty.

Question: It was a shot in the arm for your hopes of changing the UNSC.

Foreign Secretary: This is an expression of will. Ultimately we will have to go out and actually work in each of the organizations, in the proper fora. This is not the place where you negotiate. This is a place where you gather opinion when you get leaders at that level committing, and presumably you can take that to the fora and get it done. But yes, certainly it is a step forward and it is a big step to get such a clear statement. But it is because everybody feels that we need to do better.

Question: We have seen, as you said, Gordon Brown endorsing Britain's support to India as far as joining the UNSC is concerned. With this particular statement, what are India's hopes? Is this a step forward in any way?

Foreign Secretary: We still have to do the hard work in the UN. For the UNSC, we will have to do it in the UN. We have brought it in the UN to the stage where for the first time this year actual negotiations are taking place. It is not just an open-ended working group where opinions are aired. Now there is actual negotiations under the President of the UNGA from April this year. This is one more step. All five of the permanent members have signed on to this. So, we take it one more step at a time and we hope we can carry it through.

Question: The G-8 has made a declaration on terror yesterday in the statement. Did you take this opportunity to discuss terror in Pakistan in detail in the bilateral meetings?

Foreign Secretary: It was not discussed in the big meeting. In the bilaterals, certainly it was mentioned.

081. Declaration of the Leaders of the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate Change.

L'Aquila, July 10, 2009.

We, the leaders of Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, the European Union, France, Germany, India, Indonesia, Italy, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Mexico, Russia, South Africa, the United Kingdom, and the United States met as the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate in L'Aquila, Italy, on July 9, 2009, and declare as follows:

Climate change is one of the greatest challenges of our time. As leaders of the world's major economies, both developed and developing, we intend to respond vigorously to this challenge, being convinced that climate change poses a clear danger requiring an extraordinary global response, that the response should respect the priority of economic and social development of developing countries, that moving to a low-carbon economy is an opportunity to promote continued economic growth and sustainable development, that the need for and deployment of transformational clean energy technologies at lowest possible cost are urgent, and that the response must involve balanced attention to mitigation and adaptation.

We reaffirm the objective, provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. Recalling the Major Economies Declaration adopted in Toyako, Japan, in July 2008, and taking full account of decisions taken in Bali, Indonesia, in December 2007, we resolve to spare no effort to reach agreement in Copenhagen, with each other and with the other Parties, to further implementation of the Convention.

Our vision for future cooperation on climate change, consistent with equity and our common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, includes the following:

1. Consistent with the Convention's objective and science:

Our countries will undertake transparent nationally appropriate mitigation actions, subject to applicable measurement, reporting, and verification, and prepare low-carbon growth plans. Developed countries among us will take the lead by promptly undertaking robust aggregate and individual reductions in the midterm consistent with our respective ambitious long-term objectives and will work together before Copenhagen to achieve a strong result in this regard. Developing countries among us will promptly undertake actions whose projected effects on emissions represent a meaningful deviation from business as usual in the midterm, in the context of sustainable development, supported by financing, technology, and capacity-building. The peaking of global and national emissions should take place as soon as possible, recognizing that the timeframe for peaking will be longer in developing countries, bearing in mind that social and economic development and poverty eradication are the first and overriding priorities in developing countries and that low-carbon development is indispensable to sustainable development. We recognize the scientific view that the increase in global average temperature above pre-industrial levels ought not to exceed 2 degrees C. In this regard and in the context of the ultimate objective of the Convention and the Bali Action Plan, we will work between now and Copenhagen, with each other and under the Convention, to identify a global goal for substantially reducing global emissions by 2050. Progress toward the global goal would be regularly reviewed, noting the importance of frequent, comprehensive, and accurate inventories.

We will take steps nationally and internationally, including under the Convention, to reduce emissions from deforestation and forest degradation and to enhance removals of greenhouse gas emissions by forests, including providing enhanced support to developing countries for such purposes.

2. Adaptation to the adverse effects of climate change is essential. Such effects are already taking place. Further, while increased mitigation efforts will reduce climate impacts, even the most aggressive mitigation efforts will not eliminate the need for substantial adaptation, particularly in developing countries which will be disproportionately affected. There is a particular and immediate need to assist the poorest and most vulnerable to adapt to such effects. Not only are they most affected but they have contributed the least to the build up of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. Further support will need to be mobilized, should be based on need, and will include resources additional to existing financial assistance. We will work together to develop, disseminate, and transfer, as appropriate, technologies that advance adaptation efforts.
3. We are establishing a Global Partnership to drive transformational low-carbon, climate-friendly technologies. We will dramatically increase and coordinate public sector investments in research, development, and demonstration of these technologies, with a view to doubling such investments by 2015, while recognizing the importance of private investment, public-private partnerships and international cooperation, including regional innovation centers. Drawing on global best practice policies, we undertake to remove barriers, establish incentives, enhance capacity-building, and implement appropriate measures to aggressively accelerate deployment and transfer of key existing and new low-carbon technologies, in accordance with national circumstances. We welcome the leadership of individual countries to spearhead efforts among interested countries to advance actions on technologies such as energy efficiency; solar energy; smart grids; carbon capture, use, and storage; advanced vehicles; high-efficiency and lower-emissions coal technologies; bio-energy; and other clean technologies. Lead countries will report by November 15, 2009, on action plans and roadmaps, and make recommendations for further progress. We will consider ideas for appropriate approaches and arrangements to promote technology development, deployment, and transfer.

4. Financial resources for mitigation and adaptation will need to be scaled up urgently and substantially and should involve mobilizing resources to support developing countries. Financing to address climate change will derive from multiple sources, including both public and private funds and carbon markets. Additional investment in developing countries should be mobilized, including by creating incentives for and removing barriers to funding flows. Greater predictability of international support should be promoted. Financing of supported actions should be measurable, reportable, and verifiable. The expertise of existing institutions should be drawn upon, and such institutions should work in an inclusive way and should be made more responsive to developing country needs. Climate financing should complement efforts to promote development in accordance with national priorities and may include both program-based and project-based approaches. The governance of mechanisms disbursing funds should be transparent, fair, effective, efficient, and reflect balanced representation. Accountability in the use of resources should be ensured. An arrangement to match diverse funding needs and resources should be created, and utilize where appropriate, public and private expertise. We agreed to further consider proposals for the establishment of international funding arrangements, including the proposal by Mexico for a Green Fund.

5. Our countries will continue to work together constructively to strengthen the world's ability to combat climate change, including through the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate. In particular, our countries will continue meeting throughout the balance of this year in order to facilitate agreement in Copenhagen.

082. Press Release by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on the speech of Minister of State for Environment and Forests on the inauguration of the Green Building along with US Secretary of State Mrs. Hillary Clinton.

Gurgaon (Haryana), July 19, 2009.

India is very conscious of the local impacts of climate change within the country and will never allow its per capita emissions to exceed that of the developed countries. In his opening remarks at ITC Green Building event organized in connection with the visit of U.S. Secretary of State, Mrs. Hillary Clinton at Gurgaon today, Shri Jairam Ramesh, Minister of State for Environment and Forests (Independent charge) made it clear that India's position on the on-going climate change agreement negotiations is clear, credible and consistent. Embedded in the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and the Bali Action Plan, we are fully alive to our global responsibilities as well. We have done detailed modeling, the results of which are being released very soon, he said. The results are unambiguous. Even with 8-9% GDP growth every year for the next decade or two, our per capita emissions will be well below that of developed country averages he assured. There is simply no case for the pressure that we, who have among the lowest emissions per capita, face to actually reduce emissions. The Minister added as if this pressure was not enough, we also face the threat of carbon tariffs on our exports to countries such as yours.

Talking about India's economic growth he said we are ensuring that our economic growth path is ecologically sustainable-GDP is increasingly Green Domestic Product, not just Gross Domestic Product. Apart from vastly greater financial flows from the developed world, we see a critical role for international technology cooperation in enabling countries like India to adapt to climate change. In collaboration with the UN, the Government of India is hosting an International Conference on Climate Change and Technology on October 22-23rd, 2009. The New Delhi Statement on Technology and Climate Change will, we hope, be reflected in the Copenhagen Agreement.

Giving details of our comprehensive National Action plan on Climate Change, Shri Ramesh explained that it is driven primarily by our adaptation imperatives but it does not neglect what we should do on our own for mitigation also. The plan is being converted into a large number of specific programmes and projects. All this is in the public domain. The energy sector is key. Our focus is on making technology leaps to ensure lower emissions. Our biggest power utility, National Thermal Power Corporation (NTPC) has the second lowest carbon dioxide intensity in the world-that is, emissions per megawatt of power generated. Our energy consumption per unit of GDP has been falling significantly. Regarding leading steps in technologies, Shri Ramesh added we are world leaders in fast breeder reactor technology. We are also establishing a 182 MW commercial power plant based on indigenously developed Integrated Gasification Combined Cycle (IGCC) technology. WE have launched a major initiative on extracting carbon dioxide from flue gases for propagating algae in bioreactors. Our renewable energy commitment goes back over two and half decades. Sustainable forestry management is of profound importance to us. We are just embarking on a close to $ 3 billion programme (and $ 3 billion to begin with) to regenerate our natural forests that already cover some 165 million acres -roughly the size of Texas. This is one of the largest carbon sinks in the world-and a sink that will only grow in size and impact. In this connection, I seek your support for India's proposals to the UNFCCC and Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation in Developing Countries, REDD+, that is to acknowledge and reward countries who are in the business of actually expanding forest cover.

Shri Jairam suggested that India seeks to engage the world community proactively in the climate change area. He said we also seek to engage the United States of America purposively in three areas where these two countries can cooperate.

Elaborating these areas, the Minister said there are numerous opportunities for joint research, development, demonstration and dissemination projects. This could be in areas like solar energy, biomass, clean coal, high voltage power transmission, smart grids, wastewater utilization, etc. Shri Ramesh proposed to jointly explore the feasibility of establishing an Indo-US Foundation for Climate Change Technology with initial kick-start contributions from our respective governments. This will catalyze private investment into the corpus as well. The focus on this Foundation should be on transformative, discontinuity technologies that will enable leap-frogging.

Throwing light on the second area, the Environment Minister proposed collaboration in the area of environmental planning, regulation and management. He informed that we are thinking of establishing our own independent, professional, science-based national environmental protection authority. We are planning to set up a National Green Tribunal as some sort of an environmental court. I am convinced that we have much to learn from your long experience in this area. We can also collaborate in the ongoing renewal of our vast forestry and biodiversity science and management establishment.

The third and last area is for building institutional capacity for continuing research on climate change and its impacts as being of fundamental importance. Shri Ramesh said his has to be done by us primarily. He expressed a hope that the US should not overlook the importance of research in the public domain-after all this is what made the Green Revolution possible in the first place. Shi Ramesh believed that this is what will make the Ever Green Revolution, with its underpinning in ecological sustainability and equity, also possible. That is why India has proposed the idea of global technology innovation centers working. He added that America's support is crucial to get such centers going for the benefit of millions of ordinary people.

Before the inauguration of the building there was a round of discussion participated by Mr. Ramesh and Ms. Clinton on the theme of climate change, which was followed by a press conference. In his remarks at the press conference Mr. Jairam Ramesh said "Both of us are painfully aware of the global effects of climate change. Both of us want a meaningful agreement to be reached at Copenhagen in December of this year, an agreement underpinned by greater flows of national capital and technology cooperation. We have our own perspectives". He said that while taking note of the concerns of the developed countries it was important to "also takes note of the special concerns of countries like India, for continuing with their part of economic growth and the objective of poverty eradication." The Minister underlined the importance of talks to resolve the issues and said "We will continue our discussions, both in multilateral forums and in bilateral forums. Both Madam Secretary of State and I have discussed the desirability of having an engagement between the United States and India, not only in the field of climate change, but in the larger area of environmental management and forestry, I might add, because India is perhaps the only country in the world today to be launching a $3 billion program for regenerating and restoring her forests." Pointing out that the forest area in India is roughly the size of the big US State of Texas, "in the next six years we will be bringing another 15 million acres of land under forests." Stating that while India and the US will continue their engagement in multilateral forums, he said "we will also have bilateral engagement. We will discuss our common concerns. And, most importantly, we will launch a number of partnerships between the U.S. and India in various fields. I have made some specific proposals to Madam Secretary of State."

Mrs. Clinton in her remarks appreciated the recommendation of the three specific ways that the United States and India could work together and promised to immediately take the following up action on that. Underlining the importance of democracy in today's world, she said we want to show to the world that the oldest continuing democracy and the world's largest democracy can deliver and "that is what both the United States and India are committed to doing".

She said "how India and the United States can amplify this partnership and work together to devise a comprehensive, strategic approach to climate change and a clean energy future is an important topic of my trip," and added "the times we live in demand nothing less than a total commitment. The statistics are there for everyone to see. And as both of our nations reaffirmed at the Major Economies Forum just recently held in Italy, and moderated by President Obama, we need a successful outcome in Copenhagen later this year". Agreeing with the concern of countries like India, she conceded that "the United States and other countries that have been the biggest historic emitters of greenhouse gases should shoulder the biggest burden for cleaning up the environment and reducing our carbon footprint."

Assuring that "no one wants to in any way stall or undermine the economic growth that is necessary to lift millions of more people out of poverty, she emphasized that she wanted to make "two points as clearly as" she could. She said: "First, the United States does not and will not do anything that would limit India's economic progress. We believe that economic progress in India is in everyone's interest, not just India's. To lift people out of poverty and to give every child born in India a chance to live up to his or her God-given potential is a goal that we share with you. But we also believe that there is a way to eradicate poverty and develop sustainably that will lower significantly the carbon footprint of the energy that is produced and consumed to fuel that growth. And secondly, we in the United States, under the Obama administration, are recognizing our responsibility and taking action. So, therefore, addressing climate change and achieving economic growth, in our view, are compatible goals. And we know, as we look at the forecast of rising sea levels and changing rainfall and melting glaciers that India is a country very vulnerable to climate change. But it is also a country most likely to benefit from clean energy policies that are key to economic sustainability in the 21st century."

Emphasizing that "there is no question that developed countries like mine must lead on this issue (of climate change). And for our part, under President Obama, we are not only acknowledging our contributions to greenhouse gas emissions and climate change, we are taking steps to reverse its ill effects. We passed a stimulus bill through our congress where we are investing now $80 billion in clean energy technology. And we have set ambitious new vehicle fuel economy standards. At the State Department we have just established a new program that will link some of our West Coast cities with Indian and Chinese cities to help transfer clean energy technology. And we have taken up our own green diplomacy initiative, which means our embassies, the ones we build, all of those that we currently have in operation, are going to have to become greener."

Answering a question regarding India's deep reservations about accepting mandatory caps or cuts in emissions as part of the negotiations now underway i.e. "can you envision a framework in which India could sign on to a global deal that would not include compulsory caps or cuts, and therefore would not, in the Indian argument, impede their economic growth and rising prosperity?" Mr. Ramesh said: "All I can say is that India already has a national action plan of climate change which was unveiled last year. And that action plan is overwhelmingly oriented towards programs and projects that will enable India to adapt to the effects of climate change. But it also has very specific and very pointed policies oriented towards mitigating emissions. So, it is not fair to say -- as we said in the newspaper today, this morning, it is not fair to say that India is running away from the issue. India is not running away from it. India has been saying that its primary focus will be adaptation. But there are specific areas where we are already in a policy framework (inaudible) mitigation, which means actual reduction of emissions. So, whether that will convert into legally binding emission (inaudible) is the real question. And India's position is -- I would like to make it clear that India's position is that we are simply not in a position to take on legally binding emission reduction (inaudible). Now, that does not mean that we are oblivious of our responsibilities for ensuring that (inaudible) emission of greenhouse gases that both Ambassador Stern, (inaudible), and Madam Secretary Clinton spoke about. We are fully conscious of that. Energy efficiency is a very fundamental driver of our economic strategy. India is not (inaudible), but the enormous work it is doing on forestry. We have made specific proposals in the paper which I have been discussing with Special Envoy Todd Stern on giving credit for countries that India could actually -- in the business of expanding forest cover, and not just arresting deforestation. So, I think I agree with Madam Secretary of State that this (inaudible) responsible, to have an international agreement that recognizes common but different shaped responsibilities, which is the language of the (inaudible) convention, and that also involves credible action by countries like India and China to mitigate greenhouse gas emission for the future. I think it is possible. (Inaudible) between now and December in multilateral forums and in bilateral forums. This defines the (inaudible) of engagement that India's 80 percent growth and 90 percent growth is not going to create havoc, as far as global warming is concerned. We are committed to clean energy. We are committed to following a consumption factor that is sensitive to climate change (inaudible). And I (inaudible) somewhat colorfully that I meant every word that I said, that for us GDP is not gross domestic product, but green domestic product. The days of looking at GDP as gross domestic product are over. We have to look at it as green domestic product."

083. Inaugural Address by Special Envoy of the Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran at the Conference on "Society, Culture and Politics in the Karakoram Himalayas."

New Delhi, July 23, 2009.

I wish to thank the Himalayan Research and Cultural Foundation, its President Shri Hridaya Kaul, and its Secretary General, Prof. K. Warikoo, for inviting me to inaugurate this very timely and very topical interaction on Society, Culture and Politics in the Karakoram Himalayas. I join others in extending to all our friends from our neighbourhood and beyond a very warm welcome to New Delhi. The region you will be exploring, even if it is Conference-Room exploration, in all its diverse aspects of history, culture and politics, is unique in more ways than one. And to consider that uniqueness, perhaps the Karakorams themselves need to be put in a somewhat broader context.

If you look at the massive and forbidding mountainous zone, in which the Karakoram nestles in all its glory, you would be struck by the fact that there is no other place in the world where there is a comparable geography. There are six major mountain systems which lie linked together. From Afghanistan, running northwest is the Hindu Kush. Crossing the Hindu Kush to the north, across the Oxus valley, is the awesome cluster of peaks dominated by the dome of the Pamirs. The peak of Muztagata or the "Father of Snow Mountains" is literally that. It was with some justification that the Arabs described the Pamirs as Bam-i-duniya or the roof of the world.

Joining the Pamirs from the East is the Kun Lun range, constituting the southern fringe of Chinese dominions, and within the angle formed by these three great mountain systems - the Hindu Kush, the Pamirs and the Kun Lun, is our own Karakoram, described by geographers as being the mightiest of all.

Of course, the Karakorams in turn link up with the great Himalayan range in the latter's western extremity, and with the Pir Panjal which rims the Kashmir Valley.

This knot of mountains, which some have called the top-knot at the head of the world, its centre of gravity, or the very axis on which it revolves, is fully 600 miles long and 300 miles in width, comparable to a France or Germany in its expanse.

What is remarkable is that despite its forbidding terrain, its remoteness and generally inhospitable environment, this mountain zone has nurtured in its nooks and crannies, extraordinarily rich and culturally diverse communities, constituting a veritable ethnic mosaic. These communities have inhabited, for centuries, the fertile valleys and string of oases which lie dotted across this mountain zone. Despite the difficult terrain, ancient trade and pilgrimage routes criss-crossed the length and breadth of this immense cluster of the world's highest peaks. The diverse communities who call this land their own, have long co-existed with one another, rarely confronted one another. Empires and powerful states may have put markers all over, staking their claims and demanding allegiance, but this has been, throughout history, a zone of shifting political tides, not amenable to concepts of boundaries or lines that Nation States are built upon.

As I said, this region is an ethnic jigsaw but a culturally vibrant one. This jigsaw is overlaid by the ebb and tide of the world's major religions - Hindu, Buddhist, Islam and even Zoroastrianism. Each religious influence has had to adapt to more ancient rhythms of life. Ancient caravan routes and the rich trade they carried, made this the home of a veritable cross-roads culture, but a culture that emerged from layer upon layer of influences, assimilated over a vast expanse of time. These cannot be easily uprooted.

This is the legacy which is today under extraordinary stress and in danger of losing its unique but varied identity. The danger comes particularly from an imposition of singularity on peoples who celebrate diversity and take pride in their own rich cultural and linguistic heritage.

To this, I must add, is the more recent stress that I have become aware of in my capacity as a Special Envoy on Climate Change.

The entire region is being rapidly degraded as a result of climatic change and this will only add to the political, social and economic stresses that already bedevil this region.

What we witness taking place across this entire conflict zone is, in essence, a reaction to a whole spectrum of multiple stresses - political, economic, social and environmental - whether it is Swat or Buner, Waziristan or Helmand, Balochistan or Xinjiang. And we see the reverberations of these conflicts in India's own frontier regions, such as Jammu & Kashmir.

Why is the fate of the Karakoram communities important to India? Well, there is the obvious anxiety of the spill-over effect of the conflicts that now agitate this zone of instability. There is also the legitimate interest in territories and peoples that are part of India but under illegal occupation, both to the West as well as to the East. But there is a larger concern - what do the tides of fundamentalism, intolerance and sectarianism lapping ominously at our doors mean for India's own plural democracy? Therefore, the destinies of the Karakoram communities and the vision of India as a successful and inclusive plurality are in a sense, linked more than symbolically. We have a duty to be engaged more actively in the survival and I would venture to say, revival of these challenged communities.

Do we imply, thereby, a return to the past, imagined or real - of peace, brotherhood and prosperity? We do not believe this will work. What we should look at, in a contemporary context, are the sources of the region's strengths and its role as the cross-roads of trade and interchange.

We should focus on how we can draw upon the strengths of this region, its historical role, straddling major overland trade routes and its value as a syncretic culture. We should aim at the revival and energizing of the corridors that have, over the centuries, interlinked the Karakoram region in an intricate web of interaction. Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh, has said on a number of occasions that while we may not be able to erase the political lines which have been drawn on the map, but we could try and transcend them by reconnecting our neighbourhoods, allowing free flow of peoples, goods and ideas. The economic prospects of the Karakoram communities would brighten greatly if traditional trade routes could be reopened. Pomegranates from Kandhar could once again grace the markets of northern India, so would the produce of once-rich orchards throughout the region. Think of what this could mean for the well-being of people who now live in poverty and fall prey to the drug syndicates because they need some means of livelihood.

India has taken the lead in this regard. The opening of cross-LOC trade, the bus services between Srinagar and Muzaffarabad and between Poonch and Rawalakot, are already playing a positive role in reconnecting peoples. We have continued to press for opening the Kargil-Skardu route for passenger traffic and eventually as a full-fledged communication corridor. This will not only serve a humanitarian purpose but also help counter the virus of extremism and militancy.

In this context, I would like to emphasize that in its interaction with Pakistan on Jammu & Kashmir, India has always insisted that all cross-LOC links and potential projects for cooperation in specific areas, must cover the entire erstwhile State of Jammu & Kashmir, including Gilgit and Baltistan.

Any consultative mechanism across the LoC must be between self-governing and representative entities and that, too, includes Gilgit and Baltistan.

This Conference must look at how we can promote these corridors of interaction in the Karakoram Himalayas. Equally, one must focus on the extraordinarily rich and varied cultural and linguistic heritage of the region which is in danger of falling off the world's radar screen. It is our collective responsibility to preserve and to promote this varied culture, created by people who have a long history, settled existence and outstanding contributions to civilization. India feels very much a part of this civilizational network which has enriched its own culture. I earnestly hope that through interactions, such as this Conference will enable, we can begin to celebrate the cultural affinity that binds us together.

Thank you for your attention.

084. Excerpts relevant to Climate Change from the Statement of Prime Minister Dr.Manmohan Singh in the Lok Sabha on his visits abroad.

New Delhi, July 29, 2009.

On Climate Change

The Major Economic Forum Declaration adopted at L'Aquila is not a declaration of Climate Change policy by India, nor is it a bilateral declaration between India and another country or a group of countries. It is a declaration that represents a shared view among 17 developed and developing countries, the latter category including China, South Africa, Brazil, Indonesia and Mexico. Therefore, the formulations are necessarily generally worded to reflect different approaches and positions of a fairly diverse group of countries.

It has been argued in some quarters that the reference in the Declaration to a scientific view that global temperature increase should not exceed 2°C, represents a significant shift in India's position on Climate Change and that it may oblige us to accept emission reduction targets. This is a one-sided and misleading interpretation of the contents of the Declaration.

It is India's view, which has been consistently voiced at all forums, that global warming is taking place and that its adverse consequences will impact most heavily on developing countries like India. The reference in a document to 2°C increase as a possible threshold reflects a prevalent scientific opinion internationally and only reinforces what India has been saying about the dangers from global warming. True, this is the first time that India has accepted a reference to 2°C as a possible threshold guiding global action, but this is entirely in line with our stated position on global warming.

Drawing attention to the seriousness of global warming does not automatically translate into a compulsion on the part of India or other developing countries represented in the Major Economic Forum to accept emission reduction obligations. I would like to mention that our position and the Chinese position are nearly identical, and we have been coordinating with that country. Quite to the contrary, the greater the threat from global warming, the greater the responsibility of developed countries to take on ambitious emission reduction targets. That is why, 37 developing countries including India, China, Brazil, South Africa and Indonesia, have tabled a submission at the multilateral negotiations, asking the developed countries to accept reduction targets of at least 40% by 2020 with 1990 as the baseline.

The Major Economic Forum Declaration reaffirms the principles and provisions of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, in particular, the principle of equity and of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. As is well-known, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change imposes emission reduction targets only on developed countries. Developing countries are committed to sustainable development. The full incremental cost of any mitigation by them must be fully compensated by transfers of financial and technological resources from developed countries. This is fully reflected in the Major Economic Forum Declaration.

Furthermore, at the insistence of India, supported by other developing countries, the Declaration includes an explicit acknowledgement that in undertaking climate change action, the "first and overriding priority" of developing countries will be their pursuit of the goals of economic and social development and poverty eradication. This should allay any apprehension that India will be under pressure to undertake commitments that may undermine her economic growth prospects.

085. Question in the Lok Sabha: "Impact of Green House Gas Emission".

New Delhi, July 29, 2009.

Will the Minister of State (Independent Charge) in the Ministry of Environment and Forests be pleased to state:

- (a) the total quantity of Green House Gas (GHG) emitted in the country, State-wise and the reasons therefor;
- (b) the details of the adverse impact of GHG on environment and human beings;
- (c) whether the Government has taken any action to check the GHG emission from crops and their residues;
- (d) if so, the details thereof alongwith the outcome of the action taken so far; and
- (e) the effective measures taken/ being taken by the Government to check emission of GHGs including the action taken against those violating the norms of emission?

Minister of the State (Independent Charge) in the Ministry of Environment and Forests (Shri Jairam Ramesh)

- (a) to (e) A Statement is laid on the Table of the House.

STATEMENT

- (a) India's total greenhouse gas emission was 1228 million tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub> equivalent, as per the official statistics reported in the first National Communication of India (NATCOM) to the UNFCCC in 1994. State wise details are not collected. However, Sector wise break up of greenhouse gas emissions is as follows

Energy (including Power, transport & industry)	- 744 Mt CO <sub>2</sub> eq.
Industrial Processes	- 103 Mt CO <sub>2</sub> eq.
Agriculture	- 344 Mt CO <sub>2</sub> eq.
Land use, Land use change & Forestry	- 14 Mt CO <sub>2</sub> eq.

Others (including Municipal Solid Waste)	-	23 Mt CO2 eq.
Total	-	1228 Mt CO2 eq.

- (b) According to the 4th Assessment Report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) published in 2007, there has been an increase in global average air and ocean temperatures, widespread melting of snow and ice and rising global average sea level. Human beings are exposed to climate change through changing weather patterns, for example, more intense and frequent extreme events and indirectly through changes in water, air, food quality and quantity, ecosystems, agriculture and economy.
- (c) & (d) Agriculture contributes only 28% of total greenhouse gas emissions in the country. Use of agriculture residues in biomass cogeneration projects for generation of electricity and steam in the industry will help in reducing emissions from agricultural crop residues. India has approved 334 projects involving 'Biomass' under the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM). These projects, if registered by the CDM Executive Board, have the potential to reduce 88 million tonnes of CO2 equivalent by 2012.
- (e) India is signatory to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and its Kyoto Protocol. While India does not have any green house gas (GHG) abatement commitments under the Kyoto Protocol, a range of policies and programs have been followed in this regard. These include improving energy efficiency & conservation as well setting up of Bureau of Energy Efficiency, power sector reforms, promoting hydro and renewable energy, promotion of clean coal technologies, coal washing & efficient utilization of coal, afforestation and conservation of forests, reduction of gas flaring, use of cleaner and lesser carbon intensive fuel for transport, encouraging mass rapid transport systems and environmental quality management. These measures help achieve better energy intensity while addressing climate change as co-benefit.

India has also released its National Action Plan on Climate Change in June 2008 with a view to advance actions aimed at adapting to climate change and enhancing the ecological sustainability of India's development path.

Shri Eknath Mahadev Gaekwad : Madam, we need to work on a war footing to deal with the problem of climate change. We have to save our farmers from the dangers of climate change otherwise our agriculture based economy will be in trouble.

Madam, I would like to ask the Honourable Minister through your good offices as to whether they intend to make pollution controls even more stringent in order to control emission of green house gases and can he give details of the National Plan of Action?.....(Interruption)

Shri Shailendra Kumar: Madam, this is a very serious matter .....(Interruption)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam Speaker, last year in June of 2008, the Government of India announced a National Action Plan on Climate Change and the National Action Plan on Climate Change had different components. It had eight different missions and 24 critical initiatives for making India adapt to climate change. Five of these missions relate to adaptation to climate change and two of these missions relate to mitigating greenhouse gases, of which carbon dioxide is the most important. ... (Interruptions)

(Interruption)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: These missions are being implemented. The President's Address has said that these missions will be finalised and implementation thereof will start by the end of 2009. ... (Interruptions)

Shri Eknath Mahadev Gaekwad: Madam Chairperson, the Law Commission in the year 2003, in its 176th report had recommended the establishment of an Environment Court. My question to the Honourable Minister is whether the government has taken any decision on the establishment of such an environment court. And if yes, then will the people found violating the norms specified for greenhouse gas emissions be brought under the jurisdiction of this court?.....(Interruption)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam Speaker, just last week the Union Cabinet approved the Bill to set up a National Green Tribunal to deal with cases relating to environment and forests. We are in the process of introducing this Bill in the Parliament in this Session itself. ... (Interruptions)

(Interruption)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: This National Green Tribunal is based on the recommendations of the Law Commission and it is through this National

Green Tribunal that substantial cases of environment arising out of the implementation of various laws relating to environment and forests will be adjudicated. ... (Interruptions)

Madam Speaker: Only what the Minister is saying will go on record. (Interruptions) ... (Not recorded)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I urge the hon. Member to await introduction of this Bill. After this Bill is introduced, it will go to the concerned Standing Committee. We hope that by the Winter Session of this Parliament, the National Green Tribunal will come into being

(Interruption)

Shri Bhaskarrao Bapurao Patil Khatgaonkar: Madam Chairperson, the Honourable Minister has not answered the 'D' part of the question that has been asked. In the 'D' part of the question it was asked what action the government will take against people who violate the criterions laid down regarding greenhouse gas emissions. I have not got the answer for that.

My second question is....(Interruption)

Madam Chairperson: Please ask only one question

Shri Bhaskarrao Bapurao Patil Khadgaonkar: Madam, it is a complementary question.

Madam Chairperson: Okay, ask.

(Interruption)

Shri Bhaskarrao Bapurao Patil Khadgaonkar : Madam, I have not yet asked my question. I had only pointed out the shortcomings of the answer that was given and the portion of the previous question that had been left unanswered.....(Interruption)

Climate change is one of the biggest challenges the world is facing today. Glaciers are melting and the water level in the oceans are increasing. The wrath of natural calamities like floods and droughts are a reality today. The main reason for such calamities is the green house gas emissions. A recent media report says that India has given its confirmation regarding reduction of green house gas emissions in the recently concluded summit of G8 countries in Italy. Is this true? And if it is true that India has confirmed its acceptance to reduce, then to what extent will we be reducing green house gas emissions and what will be its impact on the Indian economy especially the impact on our poverty eradication programmes.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam Speaker, in response to the first Question of the hon. Member, we do not have any laws, as of now, that control the emissions of Green House Gases (GHG) most notably Carbon-di-Oxide. There is no question of violation. As and when, this issue gets discussed over the next few years, we can consider imposing caps on the emissions. But, as of now, the policy of the Government of India is not to agree to any limits or any caps on the emissions of Carbon-di-Oxide, which accounts for about 65 per cent of the GHG emissions. Now, as far as the second part of the Question is concerned, it is true that at the G-8 meeting held in L'Aquila in Italy, a statement was issued. This meeting was attended by our hon. Prime Minister. There was an aspirational goal, which is mentioned in this statement that all the countries -- that were represented at the forum -- aspire to limit the increase in the global temperature by 2°C by the year 2050. It is not a target, and it is not an operational objective. It is an aspirational goal. But you cannot take one sentence out of a three or four page document and say that India has compromised. India has not compromised because India's right to economic and social development is fully protected in this statement, and this goal of 2°C limit is only an aspirational goal, which all countries will try and will endeavour to meet.

Therefore, I want to assure the hon. Member that India has not capitulated; India has not compromised; and India has not weakened its position of climate change negotiation, which remains. We will not accept any caps legally binding emission reduction targets, now or later.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: Madam Chairperson, this is a very important question. Actually it should be discussed by the whole house. On viewing the whole question it seems that the talk is about reduction of emissions in agriculture. This will be detrimental to our country's agriculture if it is said that the methane gas emitted from the processing of our agricultural produce has to be stopped or because of this the processing itself has to be stopped or the animals from which methane gas is emitted, they have to be stopped or our cattle stock has to be eliminated because of methane gas emission. Please let us know the policy of the government with respect to emissions in agriculture and to what extent is it effective. Does the government have any intention to stop emissions in agriculture or is there any scheme for the country to make put the emissions to good use, is there any programme to this effect. Is there any intention or programme for the effective utilisation of the gases emitted from agricultural waste. Do you have any scheme in the offing.

Second, can you keep before the house a time bound comprehensive programme with regard to this problem of climate change. Glaciers melting, reduction in gas emissions and its impact on industrial production, how do you intend to work on this whole problem and what is your Integrated Comprehensive Plan in this regard. Can you keep the same in front of the house. It is a very important thing.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam Speaker, the hon. Member has asked a series of questions. Let me try to answer each one of them. The first question that he has raised relates to whether India is going to accept any cap on the emission of methane from our agriculture. Let me reiterate clearly and categorically that India remains committed to the use of fertilizers, India remains committed to its agricultural strategy, and there is absolutely no question of imposing limits on the use of inputs which may lead to methane emissions. There is absolutely no question. I want to reassure the hon. Member that when we are talking of controlling emissions of Green House Gases, largely, we are thinking in the context of controlling or making the carbon dioxide much lower, which is relatively easier, by using modern technology in our power stations. As far as agriculture is concerned, I would like to inform the hon. Member, which he is well aware of, that in the National Action Plan on Climate Change, which most MPs would have seen, the hon. Member of Parliament would have certainly seen it, one of the eight Missions is the National Mission on Sustainable Agriculture. We need, not because the world is telling us to do so, to look at alternatives to chemical fertilizers. In the States of Punjab and Haryana, for example, the yield levels have reached a certain plateau because the incremental yield that we are getting from the use of fertilizers has levelled off. In a State like Andhra Pradesh, which accounts for 40 per cent of the pesticide consumption, the hon. Member is well aware of the social consequences of using such large quantities of pesticides. One of the Missions is a National Mission on Sustainable Agriculture which uses organic manure, which uses new methods as an alternative to the use of chemical fertilizers and chemical pesticides. I am glad to inform the hon. Member that the State of Andhra Pradesh, this year, almost 10 per cent of the total cultivated area in the State would come under non-pesticide use, would come under organic farming, which has major implications on cotton cultivation in the State.

So, we are moving towards sustainable agriculture, not because the world is telling us to reduce methane emissions, we are looking at sustainable agriculture because it is in our interest and it also increases the net returns that are available to farmers.

Finally, Madam Speaker, the hon. Member has raised the question of a comprehensive plan to deal with the effects of....

Madam Speaker: Hon. Minister, I think only one supplementary question should be answered. I find, increasingly, the Members are making so many parts in one question, it becomes very long.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: Madam, the question I have raised is related to this.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam, I am only a responsive Minister.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: I am only a responsible Member.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I have absolutely no hesitation in agreeing to a detailed discussion on this subject. I have absolutely no hesitation. Whenever you decide to have this discussion, I will be prepared.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: Will you give some incentives to organic farming?

Shri Revti Raman Singh: Madam Chairperson, thank you very much. I would like to know that there has been no acceptance from India's side regarding 'Gas' in Italy. But if you see the text, then India has said that we will reduce gas emission and carbon dioxide emissions. The method that you have prescribed is renewable energy Hydro power of clean coal will be used.

Sir, have you made any technology in respect of clean coal in which there will be absolutely minimal carbon dioxide emissions. Will our existing power houses and the new ones that are being made, will they be able to use this. Have you made this mandatory and if you haven't, then by when will you make it so.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: It is absolutely wrong to say that we have given any confirmation or acceptance in the G8 statement in respect of reduction of carbon dioxide emissions. It has not been mentioned at all. If the Honourable member so desires, I can give a copy of the statement to him and he can see for himself that our Prime Minister has not given any such confirmation on India's behalf that we will cut either carbon dioxide or greenhouse gas emissions. All the Presidents and prime Ministers of the G8 countries plus the 4 other countries that participated in the meeting had only given a statement that by the year 2050 we would try to limit the increase in global temperature to two degrees Celsius. This is only an aspirational goal and not target, it is not a limit nor is it a responsibility that we have undertaken. I wish to assure the house that the acceptance given by the Prime Minister to the G8 statement is only a collective global statement and in that there is no mention of India's responsibility. Our responsibility will be according to our National Action Plan which has been announced last year. In that Action Plan as I have already mentioned, there has been mention of 8 missions and there are 24 such initiatives in which as the Honourable Member mentioned, clean coal is one important part. Our Coal Minister is sitting here, in the power sector we are trying to increase the efficiency of our power stations. If the efficiency increases, then the carbon dioxide emission will decrease. India's first super critical power plant will be commissioned in Mundra, Gujarat next year and you will see that in the coming years the power plants that will be put up by NTPC and other private companies, they will be mostly with the use of super critical technology in which there will be reduction in the emission of carbon dioxide. The Honourable Minister spoke about Coal gasification, India's first Electricity plant based on coal gasification is coming up in Vijayawada in Andhra Pradesh. It is expected to get commissioned in the next three years and when that happens, India will be among the world's 3-4 countries where this technology is being used.

086. Address by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the National Conference of Ministers of Environment and Forests.

New Delhi, August 18, 2009.

I am happy to have this opportunity to address this very important National Conference of State Ministers of Environment and Forests. This is an area which is of great national importance and I am very happy that I have this opportunity to meet such distinguished group of representatives of our people debating an issue of critical importance to the future of our country.

The multiple environmental crises that confront our country have created in many ways an alarming situation. Climate change is threatening our fragile ecosystems. We are staring at the prospect of an impending drought. Water scarcity is becoming a way of life. Pollution is a growing threat to our health and to our habitats.

The agenda before you is, therefore, wide ranging and of great critical importance. I think the first task is to educate people not just on the impact of the crisis we face but also to encourage deeper reflection on what this obliges all of us to do. There are fundamental choices that we have to make about our lifestyles; about how we wish to produce and consume, the things we ought to do and the things we ought not to do. I sincerely believe that the greatest challenge facing humankind today is the challenge of arriving at a new equilibrium between man and nature.

The challenges we face are not insurmountable. We are blessed with nature's bounty but as a people, we also have a deep cultural sensitivity to our environment. In fact, it was Smt. Indira Gandhi's vision and love of nature that led to the setting up of a Ministry of Environment in the Government of India. She initiated Project Tiger in 1972 and was instrumental in the enactment of legislations such as the Wildlife Protection Act and the Forest Conservation Act. These monumental measures were ahead of their times. It is this far-sightedness, commitment and concern for our natural heritage that we need to invoke as we deal with the challenges that confront us now.

Climate change is today a major global challenge. The world is seriously concerned about it. So are we. There should be no doubt in anybody's mind that we fully recognize not just how important this issue is to our country's future but also our own obligation to address it. We are conscious of our responsibilities to both the present and the future generations and we seek to enhance the ecological sustainability of our development path.

I seek your cooperation in making a success of the eight National Missions and other initiatives that are the key components of our National Action Plan on climate change. I would urge each State Government to create their own State level action plans consistent with the strategies in the national plans. We need much broader consultation with the States on this issue and I sincerely hope that this would be an important theme of this Conference.

There is a pressing need to modernize the existing Forest and Wildlife management system in our country. It is apparent that we have to modernize our forest departments with improved resources, communication and improved training of our personnel. I am concerned that there are a large number of positions of front line personnel lying vacant in many states in the Forests and Wildlife sector. I urge the Hon'ble Ministers of the concerned States to redress this situation on a priority basis.

Another critical issue is the need to ensure that local communities benefit from conservation so that they can be increasingly involved in the efforts of conservation. Our tribals are our environmental foot soldiers. They have guarded our forests and evolved a sophisticated way of living in harmony with nature over the centuries. Their wisdom and their experience should be utilised to preserve our forests, to nurse them rather than making them orphans of the environment. The tribal rights act is an opportunity to guarantee the legitimate rights of forest dwellers and to bring them in the frontline of the environment movement for regeneration.

The Green India campaign is a major initiative that will have many spin-off benefits. We need to quickly operationalise the Compensatory Afforestation Management and Planning Authority (CAMPA) by constituting State level authorities. I am very happy that Jairam has brought a new sense of purpose and earnestness to this department and what he has told us about the transfer of funds from the CAMPA account to the States is the forerunner of things to come of greater collaboration, cooperation between the Centre and the States. So, I congratulate Jairam for this initiative.

Our country is blessed with mighty rivers that are inextricably linked with our history, our religious beliefs, our culture and our customs of our people. It is a matter of great concern therefore that we have not been able to reverse the degradation of this very important natural inheritance.

We have decided to adopt a different and more holistic approach taking the river and not the city as the unit of planning as we have done until now. The essence of this approach is not just to focus on river pollution but more comprehensively on catchment area treatment, protection of flood plains, ensuring ecological flows and restoration of the river ecosystem.

We have established the National Ganga River Basin Authority (NGRBA) as an empowered body under the Environment Protection Act, 1986. We hope that this model will be adopted for other major rivers in our country based on the experience we gain in its implementation. We have substantially increased the allocation for river conservation programme in this year's budget, including a special provision of Rs.250 crores for the river Ganga.

It is vital that institutional structures are set up by all States for synergizing the river conservation efforts at the national and state levels. States should explore mobilizing additional resources for river cleaning through innovative models like Special Purpose Vehicles. I would also request State Governments to effectively enforce legal provisions through State Pollution Control Boards to curtail the discharge of untreated industrial effluents that account for nearly 25% of the total pollution load in our river systems.

We are all aware of the adverse impact climate change would have on our coastal areas. The Coastal Management Zone (CMZ) Notification issued in the year 2008 has been thoroughly reviewed by a committee headed by Prof. M.S. Swaminathan. I understand that this report has suggested an integrated approach in coastal area management for Andaman & Nicobar Islands and also for Lakshadweep Islands. I suggest that the Island authorities work in close coordination with the Centre to evolve an integrated approach.

I wish to draw your attention to the view that environmental clearances have become a new form of Licence Raj and a source of corruption. This is a matter that needs to be addressed head-on. There are trade-offs that have to be made while balancing developmental and environmental concerns. But the procedures must be fair, transparent and hassle free. Decisions must be taken within a specified time.

I am told that some times there are discrepancies in the Environmental Impact Assessment Reports. The September, 2006 Notification of the Ministry of Environment and Forests is a major attempt to rationalize the system of giving mandatory environmental clearance. I hope that we can improve the system further in the light of the experience gained. I would urge all the States who have not yet established State EIA Authorities to do so at the very earliest. Effective coordination between the Union Ministry of Environment and Forests and the State Ministry is vital if we are to build a credible and efficient system of assessment and clearance.

The recent introduction of the National Green Tribunal Bill in Parliament is a positive step forward. This will strengthen environmental adjudication and settlement of disputes. We should consider setting up a National Environment Protection Authority supported by regional Environment Protection Authorities.

In dealing with the challenge of climate change and environmental degradation we face the unfair burden of past mistakes not of our making. But, as we go forward in the march of development we have the opportunity not to repeat those past mistakes. Our growth strategy can be and should be innovative and different. It must be different. We are still at early stages of industrialization and urbanization. Our energy needs will increase sharply in the decades to come. We can and we must walk a different road, an environment friendly road.

For this we need access to new technologies that are already available with the developed countries. We must also make our own investments in new environment-friendly technologies. We need to strengthen the scientific foundations of our environment policies and strengthen our capacity to deal with the challenges that lie ahead. We must involve more stakeholders particularly our youth to lead the movement for environmental protection and regeneration.

I urge all of you to use your collective knowledge and wisdom and experience to seek new pathways to reverse the environmental degradation and resource depletion that threatens our economic security and well being. With these words, I wish your Conference all success. I thank you.

087. Press Note issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests suggesting that India's per capita GHG emissions in 2031 would be well below global average in 2005.

New Delhi, September 2, 2009.

India's per capita emission of Greenhouse Gases (GHG) will continue to be low until the year 2030-31. In fact, it is estimated that India's per capita emissions in the year 2031 will be lower than the per capita global emission of GHG in the year 2005. These significant findings were contained in a Report "India's GHG Emissions Profile: Results of Five Climate Modelling Studies" released here today by the Deputy Chairman of the Planning Commission Shri Montek Singh Ahluwalia. The Minister of Environment & Forests Shri Jairam Ramesh presided over the function. The Chairman of Unique Identity Authority of India, Shri Nandan Nilekani was also present on the occasion. As per the estimates of the five different studies, India's per capita GHG emissions in 2030-31 would be between 2.77 tonnes and 5.00 tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub>e (Carbon Dioxide equivalent). Four of the five studies estimated that even in 2031, India's per capita GHG emissions would stay under 4 tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub>e which is lower than the global per capita emissions of 4.22 tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub>e in 2005. This would mean that even two decades from now, India's per capita GHG emissions would be well below the global average of 25 years earlier.

In absolute terms, estimates of India's GHG emissions in 2031 vary from 4.0 billion tones to 7.3 billion tones of CO<sub>2</sub>e, with four of the five studies estimating that even two decades from now, India's GHG emissions will remain under 6 billion tones. The key drivers of the range of these estimates are the assumptions on GDP growth rates, penetration of clean energy, energy efficiency improvements etc. All the five studies show evidence of a substantial and continuous improvement in India's energy efficiency of GDP. India's energy use efficiency has been steadily improving over the years which is reflected in the decline of its energy intensity of GDP from 0.30 kgoe (kilogram of oil equivalent) per $ of GDP in 1980 to 0.16 kgoe per $ GDP in PPP (purchasing power parity) terms. This is comparable to Germany and only Japan, UK, Brazil and Denmark have lower energy intensities in the world. An Enhanced Energy Efficiency Mission has recently been approved in principle under the National Action Plan on Climate Change.

Of the five studies on GHG emissions profile in India, three were conducted by the National Council of Applied Economic Research (NCAER)-Jadavpur University, The Energy Research Institute (TERI) and the Integrated Research and Action for Development (IRADe) with the support of the Ministry of Environment & Forests. Two other studies by TERI and Mckinsey and Company were conducted with support from other agencies. These studies were taken up with a view to develop a fact based perspective on climate change in India that clearly reflects the realities of its economic growth, the policy and regulatory structures and the vulnerabilities of climate change.

The Ministry of Environment & Forests functioned as the facilitator, bringing together the five studies undertaken independently, enabling a thorough review process and publishing the results with a view to generate a meaningful and informed dialogue on the subject of Climate Change.

088. Address by Special Envoy of the Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran at the Seminar organised by the Indian Council of World Affairs.

New Delhi, September 8, 2009.

Shri Shyam Saran: Thank you very much Sudhir for the very warm words of welcome. I would also like to greet Mr. Raj Chengappa, Editor, India Today, who is a colleague on the Prime Minister's Council on Climate Change and has followed the climate change debate very extensively over the past few years.

What I thought I will do is to just give you in about twenty minutes a brief overview of the negotiations as they are. That is what perhaps you might have greater interest in and certainly is something that I am more familiar with. So, I would rather stick to something that I am more familiar with. Then perhaps Mr. Raj Chengappa can also give his own views. Then perhaps we can have an interaction.

Let me try and give you a sense of the multilateral negotiations which are taking place under the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. The current negotiations draw their mandate from the Bali Conference which was held in 1997. This was the 13th Conference of the Parties to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. What this conference did was to first of all reaffirm all the principles and provisions of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, which is more popularly known as the Rio Convention. You would recall, this historic convention took place in 1992 and was billed as a very major global event. The issue of climate change is not new. We had already been discussing climate change for several years in the 1980s. It was through very complex and rather difficult negotiations that we were finally able to come up with what is now known as the Rio Convention or the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Fifteen years down the line when the Bali Conference of the Parties took place, something new has happened so that this Conference of Parties in Bali became so important. What Bali said was that while we do have the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, since it was negotiated not much progress has taken place on the implementation of that convention; and there was need to enhance and in fact recognise the urgency of the problem of climate change because there have been recent events which show that this challenge is much nearer and much more serious than perhaps had been envisaged in the past; and, therefore, as Conference of Parties we need to get together and decide how we do enhance the implementation of the various provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

So, the Bali Action Plan has a kind of a package. The package says that we should aim to come up with, in two years at Copenhagen at the 15th Conference of Parties, a package which should have four pillars. These four pillars are: enhanced action on mitigation, which means reduction of greenhouse gas emissions; we should have enhanced action on adaptation recognising that even if tomorrow by some miracle emissions became zero, climate change would still continue to take place because climate change is taking place as a result of accumulated greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. So, even if it became zero tomorrow, because of that accumulated stock of carbon and greenhouse gases in the atmosphere, climate change would continue to take place. Therefore, it is extremely important that we also have enhanced action on adaptation. In order to bring about the enhanced action on both adaptation and mitigation we need the third pillar which is adequate financial resources. Unless you have adequate financial resources, how do you bring this about?

Fourth, you must have technology recognising that the answer to this challenge, particularly in the long-term, would be our ability to shift our current dependence on fossil fuels or carbon-based fuels to a pattern of production and consumption which is essentially based on renewable sources of energy or new sources of energy. So, technology is critical in terms of enhanced action both with respect to mitigation as well as adaptation. This has to be packaged in a long-term vision of what we need to do in the future. This is really the mandate which was given to the negotiators by the 13th Conference of Parties.

As you will note, we are not negotiating a new climate change treaty. I say this because there is a great confusion in the public mind, not only in India but certainly elsewhere as well, that somehow or the other the negotiations that we are engaged in are meant to negotiate a new climate change treaty. There is no such thing. The climate change treaty is already there from 1992. The mandate for these negotiators, therefore, in the multilateral negotiations is to come up with a package which will actually enhance the implementation of what you already have as the climate change treaty.

There is a second track. That second track is the Kyoto Protocol track. After the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change was concluded, as you know the UNFCCC enjoins upon the developed countries, the so-called Annex-1 countries, to bring about a targeted reduction in their emissions. The Kyoto Protocol which was concluded in 1997 in fact has, therefore, legally binding obligations on developed countries to reduce their emissions by whatever amount has been put down in the Kyoto Protocol by the year 2012, which is the first commitment period. We have been also negotiating parallelly with the Bali Action Plan the second commitment period targets for the Kyoto Protocol.

Again it is not that we are looking for a successor treaty to the Kyoto Protocol, which again is something which is always current in our discourse. There is no such thing. We are not looking for Kyoto Protocol expiry and we are now going to come up with something new. That is also not the case. In fact, the Kyoto Protocol has very clear provisions for dealing with noncompliance. That is, if a country has not met its commitment by the year 2012, then whatever is the balance of its commitment must carry forward to the next commitment period commencing 2013, and must also have a 30 per cent penalty. So, whatever is the target which has been given to that country for the first commitment period, not only should it make up the balance in the second commitment period but it must also add 30 per cent to its next target. So, as I said, there is a parallel track which is going on with regard to the Kyoto Protocol.

Where are we at the moment? I am afraid we are nowhere near this particular package that we have been mandated to come up with. We are nowhere near the parallel track of Kyoto Protocol where developed countries are supposed to indicate the targets they will assume in the second commitment period. Nothing is very clear. What is really happening is that there is a very concerted attempt to get away from the principles and provisions of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. So, while there is a rhetorical affirmation of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and its principles and provisions, in actual fact when we sit down for negotiations, that is not what you see.

For example, if the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change says that in recognition of the historical responsibility of the developed countries for the accumulated stock of carbon in the atmosphere they must take the lead and developing countries are not required to take on any emission reduction targets. Now we have a situation where in the negotiations what is being put forward is unless we have the major developing countries also taking on emission reduction targets, we cannot come up with a package for Copenhagen.

The UNFCCC says that the financing mechanism for adaptation and for mitigation must be located within the UNFCCC. That is, it must be a multilateral body and it should have balanced representation of both the developed as well as developing countries in order to avoid any kind of donor-driven approach; also that the payments into these financing mechanisms should be looked upon as payment for obligation, payment of in a sense debt. So, there are entitlements for developing countries as far as the financing mechanism is concerned. It is not charity from the developed to the developing countries. But today what we have is a refusal to look at any such financing mechanism and really to focus attention on how perhaps from the carbon market some money can be made available or how the financing mechanism can be actually just an expanded role for the multilateral development banks like the World Bank, something which is quite different from what was envisaged in the UNFCCC.

Another aspect that I would like to mention is technology. Where there is a clear reference in the UNFCCC that whatever mitigation actions have to be taken by developing countries voluntarily, these have to be fully compensated by both financial resources as well as technology transfer. When we come to technology transfer what are we being told? We are being told essentially, "Well, Governments do not have the technology, these are with private sector, and really what you need to do is to open up your own markets, reduce your tariffs on climate friendly technologies and goods, and offer better IPR protection than you have, and then technology will move. So, there is no willingness to consider any kind of technology transfer.

I am giving you these as a few examples. Then you may ask me, "Does India have some kind of an alternative package that it has put forward?" That is because frequently we hear that while India keeps saying no to whatever is being put forward by developed countries, India itself does not have anything to offer as an alternative. But that is not the case. We have made very detailed submissions; we have put forward our own vision very clearly. What is that vision? We say that this package obviously has to have very significant emission reduction commitments by developed countries. Why? That is because they have not whatever they were supposed to meet in the earlier period. So, they must make up for it. So, the peaking of developed country emissions was supposed to have been reached by the year 2000. But, of course, we all know that no peaking has taken place. The developed country emissions are still rising. So, in order to make up for what has not been achieved in the previous period, it stands to reason that there must be a much more significant reduction in developed country emissions if all of us agree that we are facing a more serious situation than we had envisaged before.

Because of the refusal of the developed countries to really indicate very clearly what they are willing to sign on to with the exception perhaps of the European Union which has taken the lead in this respect, and we appreciate that they have indicated 20 per cent reduction by 2020 in comparison to 1990 which is the base year in the Kyoto Protocol, most other countries have not really come out with what they are willing to take on as emission reduction targets. The indications which have come, for example in the Waxman-Markey Bill, is a meagre four per cent reduction if you take 1990 as the base year. That is simply not good enough. So, because we were not getting any kind of response from the developed countries, along with 36 other developing countries we have put forward at an earlier session in Bonn a proposal that developed countries should commit themselves to at least 40 per cent reduction in their emissions by 2020 with 1990 as the base year. On the basis of historical responsibility, on the basis of the current GDP, current per capita emissions, we have made a schedule for what could be likely targets to be taken by different countries. We have said, "If you do not agree with what we have put forward, then sit down at the table and negotiate with us. But there has been no response."

Then with regard to adaptation we say that do not make climate change a kind of a unifocal issue. If you look at the global discourse on climate change, it is almost entirely about current emissions. You do not hear other aspects of climate change. But climate change is actually a much broader subject, and for us as developing countries, adaptation is perhaps as important, if not more important than mitigation. Because of the element that I mentioned to you that even if by some miracle we had zero emissions tomorrow, climate change will continue to take place, we would still have to adapt to climate change. So, this is a very serious challenge for us and in whatever package comes out at Copenhagen we have to take cognizance of this challenge and provide for the resources, both technological as well as financial, to meet this challenge.

There is an adaptation fund which has been set up at a conference in Nairobi. This fund is being made operational. It has a governance structure which is very much in line with what we wanted. It has a balanced representation of both the developed as well as the developing countries. But the problem is that it simply does not have enough funds. The current funding is two per cent from the proceeds of the Clean Development Mechanism. So, it has about a couple of hundred million dollars available which would probably not be enough for even one or two adaptation problems. So, unless there is a very large scale transfer of resources to this adaptation fund, it will really not make much difference. So, we say that in any package we come up with at Copenhagen you must have a very major component focusing attention on adaptation.

In most of the discourse we have the developed countries seem to suggest that with the exception of the LDCs and the Small Island Developing States, other developing countries must look after their own adaptation requirements. There may not be much support available from developed countries.

Thirdly, on finance as I mentioned to you that there is no willingness to look at adequate, stable, predictable funding for any kind of mitigation action which must be undertaken by developing countries. So, instead of locating a fund within the UNFCCC, providing for its financing, according to us the financing should be done on what basis? We say there should be some kind of an assessed contribution system, an assessed contribution system according to which developed countries, in accordance with their historical responsibility, their capability in terms of their GDP, in terms of their per capita income, should be putting in a predictable amount of fund into this financing mechanism. And there should be a governing structure then which deploys these funds.

With regard to technology which is I think one of the key elements, what is the Indian submission? The Indian submission is that if you all recognise that technology is going to be a key element in our response to climate change, then does it not make sense that if there are a large number of existing climate-friendly technologies whose widespread adoption, whose rapid adoption would make an impact in our dealing with climate change? Should we not have a global mechanism which enables us to do that? So, at Copenhagen can we create a mechanism through which the most rapid and the most widespread diffusion of existing climate-friendly technologies can take place, and parallel to that there should be also a global mechanism for capacity-building. That is because even if you have technology, unless there is a capacity to absorb it, to assimilate it, it means really not very much. So, through the United Nations process you can have both a mechanism for the diffusion of technology as well as for capacity-building, and also recognising that you will need in the future transformational technology which help you bring about that shift that I mentioned to you from your current reliance on fossil fuels to a pattern of production and consumption which is essentially based on renewables. This will require transformation of technology.

In order to bring about those transformational technologies, create those technologies, is there some way in which we can pool together the scientific and technical resources of both the developed countries as well as the major developing countries to in fact generate those technologies in the future which could then again be made available as public goods? So, this is our vision of how the technology issue should be dealt with. So, we have come up with a very coherent package. This is a package which also enjoys support amongst the other developing countries. Not only an Indian approach, it is something which most other developing countries are supportive of. So, this has been put forward.

The difficulty is that in negotiations when somebody comes up with a proposal there should be some response. Or you should sit across the table and say, "Well, this part I do not agree with, how about this?" There is a certain degree of back and forth which takes place in any negotiation. The difficulty here is that whatever proposals, whatever submissions have been made by developing countries including India, there simply has not been any kind of response from the developed countries who continue to just keep pressing unilaterally what they think Copenhagen should come up with. So, there is no surprise that we have not really managed to get very far in terms of the package for Copenhagen.

So, what may happen at Copenhagen? What we think will happen is that we may yet again come up with maybe some kind of a framework declaration, something which puts down again certain pointers to negotiations which must take place post-Copenhagen. I do not see that Copenhagen is kind of end of the road or it is a make or break. We will try and make as much progress as possible to come up with some meaningful outcome at Copenhagen. But I think we should be quite prepared that we may not get a very substantial outcome.

Perhaps it might be more realistic to think in terms of some kind of a framework declaration which reaffirms the UNFCCC, reaffirms our commitment to coming out with a global response to climate change, maybe has some pointers with regard to areas that we must cover in the follow-up negotiations to Copenhagen. Frankly speaking, unless something very dramatic happens in the next few months I do not see how we will be able to come up with something which would be in consonance with the international expectations or the international rhetoric that has been built up.

Thank you very much.

The Director General of the ICWA Mr. Sudhir Devare in his introductory remarks pointed out the irony that "even a natural development like climate change is creating a sharp divide between the developed world and the developing countries." He said "it is the industrialised countries which over centuries had caused carbon accumulation in the atmosphere. Yet, it is the poorest countries which are most severely affected by climate change today." He underlined the responsibility of the developed countries "to provide the finance and technology to help the developing countries to meet this challenge rather than calling for national emission reduction targets." He pointed out the enormity of the problem by suggesting that if the rise in global temperature was to be brought down by two degrees Celsius, "industrialised countries will have to reduce their emission by more than 100 per cent below 1990 levels by 2050."

Answering questions from the floor, Shri Shyam Saran said:

"With regard to the question on financial crisis and how we anticipate what will happen in the future, the rhetoric is quite different. The rhetoric is that the financial and economic crisis is actually an opportunity. Why? Because action on climate change can actually become one of the answers to deal with the economic and financial crisis. Why? Because if you are going to invest money on climate change action, for example on renewable energy, on energy efficiency, all this would lead to a revival of economic activity; it will create new jobs; it will trigger technological innovation. Therefore, in theory at least people seem to suggest that if you were to actually plan action on climate change, this could be one of the ways in which you could revive the global economy. That is the rhetoric.

But in actual fact we are not seeing that at all. What we are seeing is that much of the action which was being taken actually, say in the United States of America, on start-ups for renewable energy has stopped. Funding of most of the start-ups in the solar energy or biomass has dried up. Much of the work that countries have planned on making this adjustment in their industry moving away from very high energy intensive methods to low energy intensive methods also is stalling because Governments are saying there is simply not enough money to do those kinds of things. So, while we could say that the economic and financial crisis is a challenge and climate change action could actually provide one of the answers to that challenge, we do not see that actually translated into practice.

My guess is that as long as this crisis continues - perhaps it may deepen, perhaps it may ameliorate in the next couple of years - we will not see much action on climate change. We will not see much action in terms of domestic action in the developed countries themselves, and we will certainly not see much action in terms of enabling developing countries to take on climate change actions, whether it is for adaptation or whether it is for mitigation.

A point was made that the US has not ratified the Kyoto Protocol and where it stands. Our view has been that Obama Administration when it came in, on another issue, the CTBT for example, has exactly the similar situation that it had signed the CTBT but the Senate did not ratify it. He has said that one of the major points on his agenda would be to get the CTBT ratified by the Congress. Why cannot the same thing be done for the Kyoto Protocol? The Kyoto Protocol was signed by the United States. Certain obligations were undertaken. Therefore, the simplest way of the US demonstrating its commitment to action on climate change is perhaps joining the Kyoto Protocol.

What the US has been saying is that it cannot join the Kyoto Protocol; it would not be politically possible for it to join the Kyoto Protocol. Therefore, it will take on commitments but it will take on commitments which will be comparable to the commitments which will be taken by other developed countries. Maybe there will have to be some kind of an implementing agreement. But questions arise about how compliance will be built into it. There are issues like that which have not been sorted out in the negotiations themselves. So, this is a bit of a murky kind of a situation. Also please remember that while the US may not have ratified the Kyoto Protocol, it is not exempt from all the obligations it has undertaken under the UNFCCC which is the primary treaty. That has been signed and ratified by the United States of America. So, the United States of America is fully governed by the UNFCCC.

A question was asked about the difference between ODA and the other kind of funding. If you look at the UNFCCC it is very clear that the financing mechanism has to be located under the UNFCCC. Therefore, it must be a multilateral fund. It also talks about, as I said, historical responsibility; talks about how any incremental cost for mitigation to be undertaken by developing countries voluntarily must be fully compensated by financial resources as well as technology transfer. This financial obligation is not in terms of a voluntary contribution, which the ODA is. ODA is not a legal obligation. On the other hand, this particular payment under the UNFCCC is an obligation. So, what is the best way in which this obligation can be delivered? This obligation can be best delivered to our mind by some kind of an assessed contribution system which fixes what would be the mandatory contribution which has to be made by different developed countries to this fund taking into account what the totality of that fund should be. We have said that that fund should not be less than 0.5 per cent of the total GDP of developed countries. Perhaps if you are looking for a really ambitious response, it should be nearer one per cent. But this is very different in character from ODA. It is also very different in character from funds which come through, say, multilateral development banks such as the World Bank. What the UNFCCC does is while it attaches primacy to the financial mechanism which must be set up under the UNFCCC, nevertheless it does provide a role for other bilateral and multilateral sources of funds. But those funds or those contributions cannot be taken as fulfilment of commitment under UNFCCC. They are supplementary in character. That is the difference.

On the carbon tariffs, this issue has been in fact looked at carefully. We ourselves have done some work on this. You might have read that during the last meeting of the Working Group in Bonn, with the support of virtually all the G77 countries we put in an amendment which could be even passed as a resolution at Copenhagen which clearly stated that any kind of imposition of carbon tariffs or border tariffs in relation to climate change action would be illegal under the UNFCCC and would not be WTO compliant. So, this has already been put in in the negotiations precisely to forestall the kind of action which we see threatened by the United States and some of the other developed countries.

There is some work going on at the moment to see whether or not there are any kind of provisions under the WTO where this may be justified under some clauses. But our current view is that it is not WTO compliant. In any case, the point we have been making again and again is that if you look at the UNFCCC, actions on climate change to be taken by developed countries are not made conditional upon any other factor. That is, you cannot say climate change action will be taken provided it does not affect our industrial competitiveness, or climate change action will be taken provided there is a level-playing field. These are extraneous issues which have been brought in at a much later stage in the negotiations; and we completely reject that because there is no provision for that within the climate change treaty itself.

There are other variations of that. For example, there is a sectoral approach which says, "Okay, if you cannot have these emission reduction standards on a national basis, we should select certain energy intensive industries like power, iron and steel, cement, paper and pulp, textiles, etc, and we should have some kind of a universal norms - you can make some adjustments for the level of development but these should be legally-binding kind of norms - which should be cross-cutting across the world. And those countries which are not up to the norm will in a sense be then open to penalisation by the imposition of certain compensatory tariffs. So, we have been also resisting that approach. When we are talking about a sectoral approach in the UNFCCC it is essentially in the nature of creating a platform for collaboration, creating a platform for sharing of best practices rather than for a sanction for legally-binding norms in different industries.

On whether the western development paradigm is sustainable or not, the problem is that we are sometimes told, "Do not make the same mistakes as we have done. You should follow a different path. You should be showing us the way." Whether we do follow our own path is a national decision. That is something which India has to decide as to what the values are by which its people would live. Yes, I think a lot of Indians will say that we should not be aping the western lifestyles; we should be going back to a more sustainable or more ecologically friendly lifestyle that we have had in the past. There are views like that.

The difficulty is this. A question I am very frequently asked is, "What will happen to the world? The world will get fried if every Indian wants to have a Nano!" My answer to that is, "Well, why do not you ask the same question yourself? What will happen to the world if we continue with our own lifestyles as they are in the West?" So, somehow or the other the manner in which the issue is put forward is, "We have made mistakes but let us continue making those mistakes. Do not question us on we making those mistakes. But you do not follow our mistakes. If I am smoking, I will continue smoking but it is very bad for you." That argument I am afraid is very difficult to sell politically in India. So, whether we should do some soul-searching; not have more millionaires; not have the kind of disparities which are coming up in India; whether we should not go in more for public transportation rather than encourage private transportation; all that is granted. I think we have to do that. There is no way that we can actually in a long-term have a sustainable pattern of growth if we do not do that.

We have tried to make some modest move in that direction in the National Action Plan on Climate Change. For example, we have the National Mission on the Sustainable Habitat. There we are in fact trying to promote public transportation. There should be more metros for example in large cities. There should be more promotion of bus services in the cities. We are at least trying to see how we can shift the emphasis of long range cargo transportation from its current very heavy reliance on road transportation to railways. So, there are efforts of that kind being made in some of those national missions. Take for example the Agriculture Mission linked to the Water Mission. Essentially for the last forty years we have followed a pattern of growth, intensive agriculture development programme being really the basis for that which is essentially chemical fertiliser intensive, pesticide intensive, water intensive, using hybrid seeds but almost like mono crop culture. The focus of that strategy has been not the farmer but has been the crop. How do you increase the yield of a particular crop? You have not been looking at the totality of the farmer's economy. So, what we are trying to do through the Agriculture Mission is to see whether or not it is possible for us to bring about a shift from that kind of water intensive, chemical fertiliser intensive, pesticide intensive growth which has a lot of downside even in terms of health consequences. Can we not shift to a strategy of development which is not water intensive? It is possible.

You have heard of the new strains of rice which are being grown in many parts of the country. Can we have an agricultural strategy which is not so dependent upon chemical fertilisers? Can we wean the farmer away from chemical fertilisers and use more traditional methods? With some very targeted use of chemical fertilisers, get rid of the use of pesticides completely. There are parts of India where chemical pesticides are no longer being used. Very effective alternative methods like bio-pesticides and local multi-cropping patterns have been tried out which themselves in fact bring about a resistance to pests. So, there are various things that are on the anvil in terms of these plans.

With regard to water the biggest difficulty is pricing of water. Unless you have a proper price for water, water conservation is very difficult to bring about. And that has become unfortunately a political issue. Unless you can build up a political consensus around that, it is very difficult to implement it. So, all the other things that we can do for water conservation we are trying to do like encouraging industry in urban areas to become water neutral. Can the water they are using in their industrial operations be recycled and reused? There are several companies which have actually become water neutral. As the demand for water in urban areas keeps on multiplying, these are the kind of things that you will have to do in terms of the use of water.

In terms of a national strategy the Government is trying to move in that direction. But if you ask me, "Have we really turned the ship around in that respect?", No. How do you change a value system in our country? That is a very difficult question to answer because willy-nilly what is the standard of success in the country today. You should have a lot of money, you should have big cars, you should be living in a big house, you should be living a lifestyle which is a very wasteful lifestyle. Unfortunately, that has become the value system in the country. Changing that requires education; changing that requires a certain lead to be given by political leadership, by social leadership. These are somewhat difficult questions to answer in the narrow field that unfortunately I work on.

There is a stirring, not just in India but in other countries too, of what I call - I have written something on this - the Three Rs, which is you have to move yourself to a strategy of economic development and consumption which is based on renewables, recycleables, and reusables. Take reusables for example. If you are looking at consumption, it is use and discard. Disposability is preferred to durability. But then it was not so long ago that you actually put a huge value on durability in this country. You like to buy a thing because it would last longer. You are now in a phase where you actually prefer something which you can use and dispose of. So, how do we bring about that kind of a change where we are looking at a cycle rather than a linear kind of a growth pattern? Culturally I would say that our trades in our own culture, civilisation which put a value on that kind of thinking. Maybe we must start going back to that as was mentioned by some people here.

Shri Sudhir T. Devare: Before we conclude Shyam, I have a few questions to ask. I have seen that the Government has announced that by 2015 we can bring down the energy consumption by five per cent. Can the National Action Plan on Climate Change take off in such a short time so that we can bring down the energy consumption by such a large chunk as five per cent? Secondly, India the largest number of Clean Development Mechanism (CDM) projects mainly relating to renewable energy. Can we be expected to show the way in addressing this problem through this record of ours in the CDMs as you go to Copenhagen in the next few months?

Mr. Syham Saran: Yes India has a very large number of CDM projects. But CDM is not really in a sense the answer to the climate change problem. CDM is a flexibility mechanism which has been provided to enable developed countries to meet their emission reduction targets in an economically cost-effective manner by doing those projects in developing countries. So, you cannot double count. If you did a particular project in your own country, the cost may be much higher. But if you did it in a developing country the cost will be much lower. So, for the emission reduction which has been achieved as a result of doing that project in India, certain credits are available, which is what you get for the projects that you are doing. The difficulty is that currently the CDM is project-based and the procedure for taking on these kinds of projects on to the CDM list, working out exactly what is the amount of credit which is earned by that particular project it is very cumbersome. There is a lack of transparency and predictability about it. So, this is something which we are trying to address in the discussions which are taking place through suggesting maybe we should go in for more pragmatic kind of CDM projects which are larger scale in nature. Once certain guidelines or certain norms have been set for a particular project or for a particular programme, if a similar kind of project comes or a similar programme comes, then you should not have to go through the entire rigmarole again. This is something which is part of the reform of the CDM process which is taking place.

With regard to your question on the five per cent, I think it is more than doable. In the Enhanced Energy Efficiency National Mission the great advantage is that we already have a legal basis for that which is the Energy Conservation Act and we have the Energy Conservation Building Board, these two instruments. So, in the Energy Conservation Act you have nine energy intensive industries which have been identified. Some of those I mentioned like iron and steel, cement, paper and pulp, textiles, power. Several energy intensive industries have been identified. The Energy Conservation Act provides for a compulsory energy audit of industrial units under these nine different industry areas. The Bureau of Energy Efficiency is able to set energy efficiency standards for each of these installations. You have to meet those. What is happening now is this is being done on a voluntary basis. But now we are moving into a mandatory basis. So, if you do not meet those targets, then there is a penalty to be paid. What we are trying to do is to put in place some kind of a market mechanism which would allow trade in energy efficiency certificates, that is, those units which meet their target and do better get credits and those who are unable to meet their norms will then have to buy those credits in order to meet them. So, this is now going to be put in place. As I said, the advantage here is that the legal basis is already there in the Energy Conservation Act.

Also you would have seen a very rapid popularisation of the Star Rating System for domestic appliances like for refrigerators, air conditioners, cooking stoves. These are going to be extended. There is also going to be fairly strict emission standards on automobiles. So, if you take all these into account, a five per cent is not actually very ambitious target. I think it actually could have been more.

090. Question Relevant to Climate Change asked from Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao at the media briefing for the Prime Minister's visit to Pittsburg for the G-20 Summit.

New Delhi, September 19, 2009.

Question: On the G20 meeting in Pittsburgh, the EU had a summit of Heads of States and Governments where they made several proposals regarding climate change. One was that all G20 States should participate in financing climate change measures in least-developed countries. What does India think of this proposal? Does it support it? Secondly, France and Germany propose that the EU levy a carbon tariff on imports if there will be no agreement in Copenhagen. What does India think of this proposal?

Foreign Secretary: On your question about forums like G20 being seized with the climate change issue, I just wanted to say that obviously all these various mechanisms including the G20 structure give an impetus to the multilateral negotiations under the UNFCCC through a strong political message. But these are not negotiating fora in themselves and cannot substitute for the mechanisms already established under the UNFCCC insofar as climate change issues are concerned.

On the issue of the carbon tariffs and the Indian position on that, as you know climate change is a global environmental concern and it requires a global response. Such a response has to be based on the principle of equity and common and differentiated responsibility and respective capabilities. And most of all it should take into account the imperatives of poverty reduction and economic development in developing countries. So, any long-term goal or any conditionalities that you set should always take into account the centrality of the need of the developing countries in this regard.

Question: Foreign Secretary, what has brought about the change for us to say that we will now cut emissions voluntarily?

Foreign Secretary: You are asking me whether India is ready to accept quantifiable emission targets?

Question: Yes. Because the Minister had first said, during the visit of the Danish Prime Minister, that we were a bit hesitant on this issue a while earlier but then now that has changed. So, what I am asking is what has prompted this change?

Foreign Secretary: Let me put it in context for you. Climate change takes place because of the cumulative accumulation of greenhouse gases in the earth's atmosphere. This has happened over two centuries of industrial activity and high consumption lifestyles in the developed world. There is thus a historical responsibility involved on the part of the developed countries. On the other hand the per capita emissions of developing countries are still very low. For example, India's per capita CO<sub>2</sub> emissions are currently only 1.1 tonnes when compared to over 20 tonnes for the United States and over 10 tonnes for most OECD countries. It is in recognition of these facts that a legally binding emission and production target has been stipulated by the international community under the Kyoto Protocol of the UNFCCC, while there is no such obligation for the developing countries. Despite this India has already declared that even as it pursues its social and economic development objectives, it will not allow its per capita greenhouse gas emissions to exceed the average per capita emissions of the developed countries. We have thus accepted a limit on our emissions, but at the same time provided an incentive to our developed country partners to be more ambitious. The more significant their reduction of emissions will be, the lower the limit we would need to accept for our own.

New York, September 22, 2009.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs.

Permit me to begin by appreciating the admirable manner in which you are guiding our discussions. I am also appreciative of the Secretary General for convening this meeting.

It is imperative that our meeting galvanizes political momentum for the real negotiations at the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

India faces one of the most enormous development challenges in the world. Nearly 200 millions live on less than 1$ a day and nearly 500 million do not have access to modern sources of energy.

Our overriding priority, therefore, has to be eradication of poverty for which we must address our energy poverty and use all sources of energy, including fossil fuels.

Climate change has now posed for us a huge adaptation challenge too as we are severely affected.

We have a major interest in ensuring a substantive and constructive outcome in Copenhagen and we will be part of the solution, even though India has not caused the problem in any way*.

* A day earlier on September 21, addressing a press conference in New York, the Environment Minister Jairam Ramesh said India will be a "deal-maker" and not a "deal-breaker," and part of a solution to hammer a new global climate pact. Mr. Ramesh said the present crisis on climate change was the "inability" of the United States to put on the table credible emissions reduction targets for 2020. "We are not part of the problem but we want to be part of the solution," he said. He emphasized that it was wrong to blame India for the deadlock on the global climate change talks. It was prepared to be an "active player in working towards an agreement." Asked about India being dubbed unhelpful and stubborn, Mr. Jairam said: "Not at all. I think the world is completely wrong on this. We have got an image that is contrary to what we have been doing. The message that I am trying to convey is that we have not caused the problem of global warming but we want to be part of the solution at Copenhagen. We want to be a deal-maker, not the deal-breaker." India's national climate plan envisaged voluntary mitigation measures

The outcome must be rooted in equity and respect the provisions and principles of the Convention, especially common but differentiated responsibilities and also historical responsibility.

It must also ensure that developing countries can pursue accelerated development, also so that they have the resources to cope and adapt to climate change.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

The background paper for today's event has posed important questions with the one on lifestyles, perhaps, being the most pertinent.

Here we cannot get away from the fundamental fact that unsustainable lifestyles and patterns of production and consumption in the developed world have caused climate change. This cannot continue.

And, the way forward must ensure that developing countries can pursue growth and poverty eradication.

Scientific evidence suggests limiting global emissions by the middle of this century to a level that would keep the temperature rise to 2 degrees Celsius.

It is imperative that this aspirational global goal includes an equitable burden sharing and that all citizens of the world have an equal right to the global resource of the atmosphere.

Moreover, developed countries must commit and deliver on significant reduction in their emissions of at least 40% by 2020 from the agreed 1990 baseline.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

India's per-capita emissions are only around 1 tonne of CO<sub>2</sub> equivalent per annum, which is a quarter of the global average and half that of the

by 2020, he said.

Warning that the impact of climate change will make some countries "failed states," top climatologist and chairman of the U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC), Rajendra Pachauri, said world leaders have a "sacred duty" to protect the earth. Mr. Pachauri in his intervention at the United Nations, said that heat waves, droughts, melting glaciers, loss of the Greenland, ice sheet and other dangers are fast approaching. "If all the delegates present in the gathering do not act on time, then all of us will become leaders and citizens of failed states because we would be failing in our sacred duty to protect this planet which gives life to all species," said Mr. Pachauri. "The science leaves us with no room for inaction now," he said. According to his estimate, around 12 countries will become "failed states" due to climate change problems like soil degradation and lack of food.

developing countries as a whole. Moreover, our contribution to the stock of carbon dioxide is negligible.

We have also repeatedly reaffirmed that our per-capita emissions would never exceed the average per capita emissions of the developed countries, even as we pursue our development objectives.

We are taking many domestic adaptation and mitigation actions on a voluntary and systematic basis.

These include national missions and other actions in the area of solar energy, extensive deployment of renewables, use of clean coal technologies, boosting energy efficiency, adoption of green building codes, large scale reforestation efforts and promotion of green agriculture, among others.

Many of the mitigation efforts in different sectors like energy, transport, industry, agriculture and forestry will have specific quantitative and time-bound domestic goals, with even mid-term deadlines, that would enable our national democratic institutions to monitor and check their implementation.

The creation of mechanisms along with provision of financial resources and access to technology which will enable us to upscale our national efforts is an important expectation that we have from Copenhagen.

Naturally, efforts that are supported by external sources will be subject to international monitoring, but it is important that the ambition levels of domestic actions are not crimped by an international review obligation.

And while private funding is important, government commitment for funding, both for mitigation and adaptation, has to be a key element, to ensure predictability and to catalyze other flows.

For new green technologies to be deployed effectively in the developing world, rewards for innovators would need to be balanced with the needs of humankind. This, along with collaborative R&D activities, I believe is the critical piece of the climate puzzle.

In this connection, I would like to mention here that India is organizing a major conference on technology cooperation for climate change in collaboration with the United Nations in Delhi in October this year. This Conference will feed into Copenhagen substantively.

Hon'ble Co-Chairs,

Climate negotiations should be focusing on the developed countries from where the problem has emanated and who are reluctant even to meet their commitments on emission reduction, let alone provide technological and financial support to developing countries on the vast scale that is required.

Instead, the onus for action is sought to be shifted to developing countries, which have contributed little to the accumulation of greenhouse gasses and face the huge burden of adaptation.

Protectionist trade and border tax response measures, which basically seek to protect their competitiveness, are being talked about in developed countries under the garb of climate change.

And, regarding financial resources for developing countries, even in so far as the minimalist amounts that appear forthcoming, all efforts are underway to ensure that their governance remains outside the UNFCCC and squarely in control of developed countries.

There is a tide of change in world economic relations. Climate negotiations should not seek to stem this tide.

Thank you.

0092. Media Briefing by Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran.

Pittsburg, September 24, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): As many of you had requested, the Special Envoy to Prime Minister Mr. Shyam Saran, who had participated on the 22nd of September at the high-level event on Climate Change at UN in New York, is here to talk to you, to give you a perspective on issues pertaining to climate change and energy security. After his opening remarks he will be happy to take a few questions.

Special Envoy to Prime Minister on Climate Change (Shri Shyam Saran): Thank you very much and a very good evening to all of you. I thought I will just give you a brief perspective on the issue of energy security and climate change which will, of course, figure in the G20 Summit but has been also the focus of several high-level events in the recent past.

The G20 Summit which will convene tomorrow will have as its focus on the global economic and financial situation. Recognising, however, that climate change and energy security related issues are very closely interlinked, we expect the Summit to convey a significant commitment to accelerating a shift away from a pattern of economic activity based on depleting and finite reserves of fossil fuels through the promotion of renewable and clean sources of energy.

The Summit is expected to reflect an acknowledgement by the G20 leaders that success in the ongoing multilateral negotiations on climate change requires the mobilisation of new and additional financial resources to support both mitigation and adaptation action in developing countries. This will provide political momentum to our deliberations under the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

We do not see the G20 as a forum for negotiating on climate change issues, and that includes the finance issue as well. The sole negotiating forum for climate change is the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. Nevertheless, a strong political message from the G20 leaders that they are committed to a comprehensive, balanced, and above all an equitable outcome at Copenhagen would have a favourable impact on the negotiations. In this respect the G20 Summit will be able to build upon the success of the recently concluded Summit on Climate Change which was convened by the UN Secretary-General on September 22, in New York.

The Secretary-General's summary, if you have had a chance to look at it, reflected the strong determination on the part of world leaders to spare no effort to ensure a successful outcome at Copenhagen. From our perspective it is a matter of satisfaction that the UN Secretary-General's summary reflected, broadly speaking, our own approach in particular the need to locate climate change response within the context of sustainable development and poverty eradication.

The External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna, and the Minister of State for Environment and Forests Shri Jairam Ramesh participated in the interactive roundtable, which followed the opening plenary. External Affairs Minister made a brief presentation outlining our perspective on climate change and acquainting the Heads of State and Governments present with India's own significant actions to deal with the twin challenge of energy security and climate change.

I wish to give you also a brief outline of our discussions at the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate Change which was convened in Washington on September 16 and 17. There we reviewed the developments in climate change negotiations since the adoption of the L'Aquila declaration on climate change. It was agreed that we need to place greater emphasis than hitherto on adaptation to climate change by developing countries for which both financial resources as well as technology transfer would be required.

There were a number of presentations on technology cooperation among the MEF countries themselves. These included energy efficiency, solar energy, wind power, smart grids, carbon capture and storage, and clean coal technologies. India and Japan by the way are the co-leaders on the last mentioned project, the clean coal technologies, and have drawn up a work plan to promote cooperation in this area. This was very well received at the meeting.

The Washington meeting also considered the issue of mitigation, and in particular the manner in which voluntary national actions being undertaken by developing countries could be reflected in a Copenhagen agreement. India has recommended that these national actions such as those incorporated in India's own National Action Plan on Climate Change could be reflected in the national communication to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, which is already provided for in that Convention. There appears to be a growing receptivity to this approach.

Like the G20 we see the Major Economies Forum also as a useful forum in which major economies can exchange views in an informal manner on several issues confronting the climate change negotiations. These deliberations can be helpful in promoting consensus at the negotiations but, of course, cannot be a substitute for those negotiations. In our view, substantive decisions can only emerge through the multilateral process since that is where all the stakeholders are represented.

Thank you very much and I will be very happy to answer any questions that you may have.

Question: I was wondering whether you could comment on this announcement from President Obama on reducing the subsidies on fossil fuels. Is India prepared to act on that and to remove direct subsidies and incentives on fossil fuels?

Special Envoy: That is one of the issues which are going to be under discussion at the Summit. As you may be aware, we look upon subsidy as something that should be retired over a period of time. At the same time we have to take into account the fact that in a country like India there are also large social needs of a population which does not have any access to energy at all. Therefore, whatever measures we take in respect of the rationalisation of fuel subsidies will have to cater for the interests of those sections of our population.

Question: Basically I wanted to elaborate on this question itself. We have set up Committee after Committee on lowering subsidies and allowing our long-term commitment to decontrol the retail fuel prices. Climate change apart, there are domestic compulsions of energy efficiency, economic efficiency, which require us to do this. Unless we show this minimum political courage to do what we undertook as a Government policy way back in 1998, how seriously will the rest of the world take our commitment to climate change?

Special Envoy: I do not think I need to go beyond what I have already said. That is, as a policy objective certainly we need to rationalise energy prices. That is something which is conceded. I think we are already making moves in that direction. But as I mentioned to you, we also have to take into account that there are very large sections of our population whose energy requirements will also have to be met in some manner. Therefore, while we are taking this policy forward, we will have to be sensitive to the requirements of that section of our population.

Question: Before you all came to the US, earlier in the month we had the Indian position that India would not bend to US demands for legally-binding caps on carbon emissions. It was made very clear that that was the position that you would not bow to any threats or demands from the US side. Now that you are here and this is on the agenda, can we hope in terms of maybe a softening of India's stance, a change perhaps, a clarification, that would bring the two sides closer together? Or are you going to stick to that stand?

Special Envoy: I do not think that emission reductions or issues which are there before the climate change negotiations are going to be considered here at Pittsburgh. That is not the focus of the meeting here. The meeting here will be essentially on the global economic and financial situation. As far as the issue of emission reductions is concerned, I think it continues to be our position that we will not be able to take absolute emission reduction targets of the kind which developed countries are obliged to take under the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. However, that does not mean that India is not taking a number of significant mitigation actions itself. We have a National Action Plan which covers both mitigation as well as adaptation, and there are several national missions whose objective would be in fact to mitigate emissions. That is quite well understood. What we have conveyed is that there are things that we will be able to do within the limitation of our own resources. However, if we are to do more then it is obvious that unless there is enabling support both in terms of financial resources as well as technology transfer, taking such action will in fact impact on our growth process. I think this is something which is fairly well understood by our developed country partners. I do not think it is true that we are facing demands or facing threats that we should undertake emission reduction targets. I think there is an understanding that India is doing quite a great deal, but there must be some way in which this could be reflected as far as the Copenhagen agreement is concerned. What we have indicated, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, is that those actions, whatever we have done and what we intend to do in the future, could be very well reflected in the national communication to the UNFCCC which is an instrument which has already been provided for under the Convention.

Question: Just going back to the fuel subsidies, you said that in the medium term you recognise the need to phase out fuel subsidies. Can you give us a timeframe on that? We have heard that there was going to be a timeframe of around five years mentioned in the G20 communiqué. What kind of timeframe is India looking for?

Special Envoy: I will not anticipate or prejudge what the result of the deliberations would be in the G20 because those deliberations are still to take place. I would also like to point out here that the aspect of fuel subsidies should be taken in the correct perspective. If you take the prices of fuel in India relative to the disposable incomes in India, in fact energy prices in India are probably the highest in the world. When we are looking at the aspect of energy pricing we should also keep in mind what is the level of development that a country has. Having said that, it is important for India as for other countries, if there are distortions in terms of energy pricing it is in our own interest to try and remove those distortions. A general commitment to that objective is likely at this Summit. But in what form it will appear, we should wait and see the communiqué.

Question: What would be the relationship between national commitment and international obligation? Would it be the case that India will take national actions and notify an international agency so that that becomes an organisation that notes and records actions of countries like India but enforces actions taken by other countries? Would it have then a dual role of noting information from some countries and enforcing action in others?

Special Envoy: Please be aware that as far as the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change is concerned, it obliges only the developed countries to take on absolute emission reduction obligations. Developing countries are not expected to take on such obligations, although developing countries are encouraged to take mitigation actions with the provision that these need to be supported by adequate financial resources and technology transfer. That is the legal position. That is how in the Kyoto Protocol, which was concluded in 1997, you have an Annex-I list which is basically developed countries with quantitative reduction targets that they are supposed to achieve by the year 2012. That is the first commitment period. Developing countries are parties to the Kyoto Protocol but they are not expected to take on any quantitative reduction targets. That is the legal position. What we have conveyed in the negotiations is that not because we are under pressure but because we believe that this is something which is good for India, there are number of things that we are doing and will continue to do within the limitation of our own national resources. These actions by India can be reflected in the national communication which is an instrument which is already provided for under the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. No new instrument is required. What will this national communication do? It will give the international community a clear picture of what we have been able to do and what we intend to do in the future. So, if the international community is looking for a picture of what India is doing both in respect of mitigation as well as adaptation, this is where that information will be available. But this is quite different from the absolute emission reduction targets, quantitative targets which have to be undertaken by the developed countries, for which there is also in the Kyoto Protocol a compliance procedure.

Question: Mr. Saran, if I could ask a question about national security partly related to energy security, can I get your reaction to the Security Council Resolution this morning asking all non-signatories of the NPT to sign? What is India's position and what is your reaction?

Special Envoy: This is straying a bit far away from climate change. I will only repeat what has officially already been stated by the Government of India, that is, we do not intend to be a party to the NPT as a non-nuclear weapon state. We have also said that we are committed to the goal of nuclear disarmament; that we have also reaffirmed our commitment to a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing. As far India's position is concerned, that has been very clearly laid out. I really do not have anything more to add to that.

Question: Sir, you mentioned about additional funding. There are some countries which are looking at funding through the existing multilateral institutions. Does India support that view, or are we looking for a separate mechanism?

Special Envoy: We draw our position from what is stated in the Framework Convention itself because that is really the starting point of what we are trying to negotiate. What the Convention says very clearly is that there should be a financial mechanism set up within the UNFCCC itself and that it should be, therefore, multilateral in character. In pursuance of that we actually already have an institution which has been set up for adaptation. We have an adaptation fund. That adaptation fund is multilateral; that adaptation fund has a governing structure which has a balanced representation from both developed as well as the developing countries. The problem really is that there is not enough money in the adaptation fund. What we are looking for in the negotiations is similarly the setting up of such a multilateral institution located within the UNFCCC and having a similar kind of governance structure, but it must have access to sufficient, predictable, stable financial resources. That is really the challenge. This does not mean that we reject financing that may be available through the multilateral development banks. There may be financing available even through bilateral sources. That is also provided for in the Convention. But these cannot be taken as fulfilment of the legal obligation which is incorporated in the Convention. So, we have a very clear perspective on this that we need to have a multilateral institution within the UNFCCC itself.

Question: Watching the way things have been unfolding in the last one week one gets the feeling that climate change has become the single biggest, most important issue in international negotiations. Perhaps that is reflected by the fact that as Special Envoy of PM on Climate Change you have been a common factor at three major meetings in the last one week. You were at the Major Economies meeting; you were at the SG's Climate Change Summit, and you are here. So, overall, where would you place climate change in the hierarchy of international diplomatic negotiations at the moment? Secondly, would you say that SG's summary on the Summit on 22nd is an accurate reflection of international thinking on the issue? I understand that at the various roundtables all the participants including our two Ministers got only one and a half minutes to speak. So, how can you state any position in one and a half minutes' time? So, is the summary an accurate reflection of what the thinking is?

Special Envoy: Please do not ask me to paraphrase what the UN Secretary-General has projected as the basic understanding amongst the leaders who took part in this high-level event. I can only go by what he has stated because we were obviously not present at all the roundtables. We were present only at one roundtable. It would be fair to say that no doubt the climate change today is at the very top of the international agenda. One of the reasons is also because we are only a few weeks away from Copenhagen where we need to come up with an agreed outcome on climate change related issues. So, there is a certain sense of urgency; there is a certain sense that we are coming very close to the decision point; and, therefore, we need to mobilise international opinion, the political will amongst leaders, in order to ensure that we come up with an outcome which meets the expectations of the international community. From that point of view, the high-level event in New York did serve the purpose of bringing together a fairly large number of important leaders to first of all give a very clear political message that (1) the leaders in the world recognise this as a major challenge, (2) that all the leaders who attended the special event are committed to ensuring that there is a successful outcome at Copenhagen, (3) that whatever is required in terms of the national efforts which have to be made by different countries in terms of facilitating this outcome, that will be forthcoming. As I said, this is not the negotiating forum.

Neither is the G20 a negotiating forum nor for that matter MEF is a negotiating forum. But the value of these fora lies in the fact that they represent a certain strong political will amongst major countries, and give a signal that we attach a lot of importance to coming up with a comprehensive, a balanced and above all an equitable outcome at Copenhagen. Several of these ideas, as I mentioned, are reflected in the summary which has been provided by the Secretary-General.

Question: You talked about our own national action plan and how we are going about reducing emissions. Are we in a position right now to quantify that in the next five years these are the kind of reductions that would happen? There were talks that a legislation is also being planned on the lines of the fiscal legislation that we have in India. Secondly, in terms of financing, what are the financing needs of India till 2020? The UN estimated that to be about 500 billion dollars.

Special Envoy: Firstly, as I mentioned earlier, the National Action Plan has eight National Missions. These eight National Missions include mitigation actions; they also include adaptation action; and by the way they also include a very strong technology component. We also have a National Mission on Strategic Knowledge because we need to have a much more detailed database for dealing with climate change issues than we have now. So, it is a much more broad ranging kind of action plan which is not focused entirely on mitigation. However, take for example the National Mission on Enhanced Energy Efficiency which was recently approved by the Prime Minister's Council on Climate Change. In a Mission like that obviously there will be targets. For example, we are looking at something like a 20 per cent improvement in energy efficiency by the year 2020. You can very well reduce that to some kind of a carbon figure too because reducing energy intensity also means the requirement of reducing carbon intensity. If you take for example the project that we have on renewable energy, obviously if we are going to meet a certain target by say 2020 on solar energy or other renewable sources of energy, then you can say we have been able, through this, to avoid carbon emissions of such an amount. So, in some cases obviously we can put targets. In other cases we may not be able to put targets. Take forestry. Yes, of course, you can put a target.

We have already put a target of increasing our forest area by something like six million hectares, which is really creating a very large carbon sink in the country. These are very significant actions which we are taking, but these actions are not only related to emission reduction but they are also related to the much broader issue of sustainable development. We look upon climate change issues, as far as India is concerned, not narrowly from the perspective of only reducing emissions but from the larger perspective of promoting sustainable development. That is the approach that we take. In terms of what is the kind of financing which is required, we are not looking at the financing question in the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change as only related to India. But we certainly do have a sense of what may be required in terms of financing requirements of developing countries as a whole. taking into account the fact that there are a whole series of challenges that we face not only again in terms of mitigation but also adaptation. In fact for many developing countries adaptation challenge is perhaps the greater challenge. What is the kind of scale of resources that we need to have for meeting these requirements? Our own view is that it is something between the range of 0.5 per cent of developed country GDP to one per cent of developed country GDP. If we say we require a very ambitious response, the mobilisation should be closer to one per cent. But perhaps, maybe realistically only 0.5 per cent of the developed country GDP may be available. This is something which is still under negotiation. We have not yet come to a conclusion on this point.

Question: Mr. Saran, you said that the G20 is not the forum for negotiating any kind of emission targets. So, why bring up the issue here because on both the sides the stated positions are quite obvious? You are not going to accept any legally-binding norms and they have their own position. Secondly, you mentioned that India expects that the G20 will affirm some kind of commitment towards the successful completion of the Copenhagen round. Is there a feeling that probably you would not have a successful conclusion of the Copenhagen Summit from the position right now and it will probably end up like the Doha round of talks?

Special Envoy: The reason why climate change has entered the agenda of the G20 is because there is a link between energy security and climate change. Energy-related issues are very much the province of the G20. In that sense the linkage is something which is worth looking at from the point of view of the leaders. At the same time, these are 20 of the world's top leaders who are meeting here. If at their level, without going into the nitty-gritty detail, there is a very clear message which comes across that they are committed to a successful, to an ambitious outcome at Copenhagen, this is a very strong signal to those of us who are actually sitting down in the negotiations. This is the value of the kind of message which may emerge from the G20 not necessarily in terms of this and that specific issue. So, take for example the issue of financing. Unless there is a large scale mobilisation of financial resources, how do we ensure that there is an ambitious outcome? If there is a clear commitment which emerges at G20 that we acknowledge the need for the mobilisation of these large scale resources and we are committed to finding those resources which may be required, that would be a very valuable outcome from the G20. That is the sort of message that we are looking for.

Indian Ambassador in the USA (Shrimati Meera Shankar): If I may add, this is not the main focus of the G20 meeting, as the Special Envoy to PM has said. The main focus will be to review the international economic situation, assess the impact of the measures that various countries have taken for national stimulus plans within their own economies and what impact this has had globally. You have had the Finance Ministers' meeting in London which came to the conclusion that these had had an impact in terms of moderating the economic recession; and that countries should begin to look at exit strategies but continue these for sometime because there was still uncertainty about the economic situation. They will look at that. They will review the decisions they had taken in London. They will look at the regulatory measures for the financial system which have been discussed. They will look at the whole issue of more representation in the international financial architecture for emerging economies. There are a range of issues on the table. This is one of the issues which they will be looking at. But those discussions are going to take place still tomorrow. Therefore, we are really not in a position to comment on what the outcome would be.

Question: The position is that G20 is not the negotiating forum for the climate change related issues. On the other side there have been lots of reports in different newspapers and media organisations that the UNFCCC as a forum may not be able to clinch a deal on these issues as per the deadline. What do you think will be the way out to stick to the deadline and meet the targets?

Special Envoy: We are very clear in our mind that the only negotiating forum for climate change is in fact the UNFCCC process. Why? Because 20 countries sitting here, or even a smaller number of countries sitting somewhere else, cannot make decisions on behalf of a very large number of other countries who are represented in the UNFCCC. They are also parties to the UN Convention. You cannot say that you take on the right to determine for them because these things are better done in smaller fora with regard to several of these important issues which will impact on them as much as they would impact on us. However, what these fora can do is to facilitate those negotiations to encourage the process of consensus-building, to encourage confidence. Those are the kind of things that can be done. But we have no doubt in our mind that the place where these decisions have to be taken is the multilateral forum. There are challenges, of course. There are a number of issues on which we have not been able to get common views. That is why there is a value to what we are doing here or what we have been doing in the Major Economies Forum or what the Secretary-General has been trying to do in New York. Can we at the political level give a certain impetus, give a certain momentum to those negotiations? Hopefully, on some of the outstanding issues on which we continue to have differences, we will be able to bridge those differences in the time that is remaining. I think that is the perspective in which you should see it.

Question: I know that Indian per capita emissions are much less than China's. You cannot compare the two. But insofar as there is a tendency to club major developing countries together, do you feel that President Hu Jintao's commitment or assurance recently that China was willing to accept some kind of non-quantifiable but significant reductions? I think the phrase used was major cuts.

Indian Ambassador in USA: Reduction on the growth of emissions, not absolute emission reduction.

Question: Exactly. It was a new kind of language which certainly India has not spoken yet. Do you feel that this may increase pressure on India to also follow suit? Secondly, I get the sense on the eve of all these multilateral discussions that India gets pushed into a sort of holding operation. There is a huge amount of discussion as to how India is not doing what it needs to do and the entire burden of global discussion seems to be on getting somebody who is contributing actually very little to global emissions, to do more and more. There seems to be much less focus, much less discussion and emphasis on actually getting the major polluters to stick to their commitments embodied in the Framework Convention. Can you give us an insight into the kind of discussions that happened around the table when you are with these powers as to their willingness to engage and actually delivering on their commitments?

Special Envoy: As far as your first question is concerned, I think what China has announced in New York is very much in line with what India has also announced. I think there you are wrong that India has not used that same kind of language. I think what India has very clearly stated on a number of occasions is that while India may not be in a position to take on targets for absolute emission reductions, India has signed on to, along with other major developing countries, bringing about a significant deviation from business as usual emission trajectories provided there is sufficient amount of financial resources and technology transfer which is available. I think what China has been saying is very much in line with the position which China as well as other major developing countries have taken. I will draw your attention to the G5 declaration; I will draw your attention to the L'Aquila declaration. In all those you can find this very clearly reflected. It is not just a Chinese position, this is actually a common position taken by the major developing countries.

Question: Is the Chinese position ...(Inaudible)... by financial requirement?

Special Envoy: Even in our case, after all what have we been saying? There are things that we are able to do within the limitation of our own resources. If we have to do more than that, then we require financial support and technology transfer. If you look at the Chinese statement, there also there is a very clear reference to the need for developed countries to transfer financial resources and technology to developing countries. I do not think there is any difference of opinion in that respect.

As far as why is there a pressure on India, certainly sitting in the negotiating chamber I do not see why we should be defensive at all. As you mentioned, the legal obligation to reduce emissions is really that of the developed countries. What we have been saying is that whatever you were supposed to achieve under those legal obligations you have not been able to achieve. Therefore, for the subsequent period you need to do much more to make for lost time because you yourself are saying, and which we agree with, that we are very close to the tipping point. You cannot say that we are close to the tipping point and then not come up with the kind of reductions which are required. The year 2000 was the year when the developed country emissions should have peaked. They did not peak. Now we are talking about peaking by maybe 2020. We have already lost a lot of time. That is the reason why India, together with a number of other developing countries, has put forward a formal proposal in the negotiations calling for at least a 40 per cent reduction in developed countries' emissions by 2020 with 1990 as the base year. Only if this kind of a target is actually signed on to would there be credibility to the much higher targets which developed countries say they would be ready to take by the year 2020. Credibility of that target is very much dependent upon what developed countries are ready to do in the interim period. I do not think there is an issue of India being under pressure here. I think we are on a very strong wicket.

Question: A swift clarification on the last point. How much of support do we have for this position of 40 per cent reduction by developed countries by 2020?

Special Envoy: There are 37 developing countries which have signed on to this proposal and which includes all the major developing countries like China, Brazil, South Africa, India, Indonesia. All the major developing countries are represented in that 37, plus a very fairly large representative section of the developing countries.

Question: What is India's view on market-based instruments for carbon trading?

Special Envoy: As I mentioned to you, what is required under the UNFCCC, and what is also there in the Bali Action Plan, is for a financial mechanism to be set up under the UNFCCC for mobilising and for deploying financial resources to support adaptation as well as mitigation in developing countries. I also mentioned that an adaptation fund on these lines has already been set up under the UNFCCC. So, what we are really looking for is much more resources to be put in the adaptation fund, and also having a major fund which would deal with the mitigation actions in developing countries. Having said that we have no problem with carbon trading; we do not have any problem with mobilisation of resources through other means such as emission trading scheme or through auction of assigned units. There are several such instruments which are available. We have no difficulty with that. But those cannot be taken as the fulfilment of the legal commitment which is there in the UNFCCC. That is our position.

Question: Ambassador Meera Shankar, do you think India suffers from an image problem on the issue of climate change in western countries in general and particularly in America? What I mean is, what looks so obvious from Delhi and Bombay and what hardly needs any explanation or logic or support, it is so debatable here. Mr. Saran, before Copenhagen, do you have any plan for major talks with China or any other Asian countries or developing countries to have a major strategy?

Indian Ambassador in the USA: I think most countries tend to look at these issues from their perspective. What we see reflected in the US media quite often is the US perspective on climate change. Clearly the Indian position is not as well understood as we would like it to be. But as the Special Envoy to PM said, when we actually sit down in the negotiating or discussion forums like the Major Economies Forum, actually the degree of understanding is more than is reflected sometimes in news reports. In terms of the facts of the situation really, as Siddhartha said, we emit roughly about 1.4 tonnes per capita. Our Prime Minister has said that India is determined that its per capita GHG emissions will never exceed those of the developed countries. That is an incentive for the developed countries also to do more because the lower the level to which they reduce their emissions, the lower would be the threshold that India would undertake not to cross. Then as Special Envoy to PM said, in the meetings at L'Aquila and elsewhere India has indicated that we would be willing to look at how we can reduce the growth of emissions even as we develop. Because of our development requirements, we have to see how we can see that we develop in a way which deviates from business as usual. That is, if in the normal course your emissions would have grown by a factor of 'x', can we undertake actions at a national level which would ensure that that growth of emissions is 'x' minus?

Special Envoy: Concerning consultations with other developing countries, this is a constant process. In fact, we have very close consultation with all the major developing countries like China, South Africa, Brazil. We have the G5 format in which Mexico is also included. There are the BRIC consultations. So, there are a number of fora where there is a very regular and continuous process of consultation and coordination of our positions. On the sidelines of many of the meetings such as the one which is being held here, there would also be similar kind of coordination. As far as visits are concerned, you are probably aware that our Minister for Environment and Forests visited China recently where he had very extensive discussions with our Chinese friends. I have visited the Maldives to talk to our friends, particularly from the Group of Small Island Developing States. I have also earlier visited Mauritius in the same connection. We have a constant engagement with the United States itself. Whenever I have come to Washington, I also have bilateral meetings with our counterparts in the United States. There is a constant engagement, a very intense engagement which is taking place between India and all its partners, both developed country partners as well as developing country partners.

Question: ...(Inaudible)...

Special Envoy: In terms of the developing country positions, you will find that much of the positions that we have taken on major issues are the same. Otherwise, how do we come up with G77 plus China submissions? How do we come up with the kind of submission that I mentioned to you. All those are the result precisely of that kind of coordination and consultation. In all the multilateral negotiations that we have, our effort is to try and see whether we can mobilise a consensus position amongst the G77 and China because our interests on certainly the broad issues are very much similar. There may be specific issues by the way where our perspectives may be somewhat different. But on the broad issues, the broad approach, I think we are more or less on the same pitch.

Question: The Japanese Prime Minister made a recent announcement that you would like to have some sort of an IPR understanding to solve the issue of technology transfer on the climate change issue. What is our view about such an IPR understanding? Would we be prepared to apply that to any IPR that India may have in that area? Secondly, you spoke about national communication. Could you explain how you think that is going to play a role in the Copenhagen position that India will be taking?

Special Envoy: The last question first. The issue has come up that even though developing countries need not take absolute emission reduction targets and we acknowledge that developing countries like India, China and others are already doing quite a great deal in terms of climate change action including on mitigation, there must be some way that this should be reflected as part and parcel of the outcome in Copenhagen. In that connection what we have pointed out is that you do not have to look too far because there is already a legal obligation on the part of all countries who are parties to the UNFCCC to submit national communications to the UNFCCC on the basis of certain norms which have been agreed upon, certain guidelines which have been agreed upon, under the IPCC. There could be the need for making those national communications more frequent. Okay, we are willing to look at it. Perhaps these norms need to be revised. Maybe you need more detailed information. Okay, we are willing to look at that. But the requirement that there should be something like a legal instrument through which this reflection should be made, to us, is already available within the UNFCCC itself and, therefore, why not use it. As I mentioned in my opening remarks, this is a position we are finding that people are becoming more receptive to. Hopefully we can take this forward.

Question: And you think this would answer the question about India is not doing enough ...(Inaudible)...

Special Envoy: I do not think that the argument today is India is not doing enough. I think there is a recognition that India actually is doing quite a great deal. But the question is, is India ready to convert whatever it is doing into legally-binding targets under an international instrument? Frankly, the answer is 'no'. We are not in a position to do that. What we are in a position to do is that whatever we are doing domestically we have no difficulty in transparently reflecting this in an instrument which is already available to us.

With regard to the IPR issue, what we have been saying is, if we all agree that we are facing an elemental threat to humanity, that we are really confronted with an extraordinary challenge represented by climate change, then it seems to us very logical that if there are a whole suite of available climate friendly technologies, as many of the developed countries themselves say are already available, does it not make sense to come up with a global mechanism at Copenhagen through which there can be the most rapid and the most widespread diffusion of these technologies? Secondly, we will probably also need a global mechanism for capacity-building in developing countries. You may have a technology but unless you have the capacity to absorb it, to assimilate it, that technology is of no use. Our view is that with regard to several of those technologies which are already available, let us try and find a mechanism through which we can bring about this wide diffusion accompanied by a capacity-building mechanism as well.

It is in this context that the IPR issue becomes important. If there are these technologies, then unless you adjust the IPR how do you bring about that rapid diffusion? The argument against that is, "Oh! But this will mean that you are harming the interests of the innovator or whoever is holding the IPR. Or you are talking about technology transfer but you know this technology is not available with us governments, it is available with the private sector. How do we ensure that there should be transfer taking place?" We do not think that these are really valid arguments because you can think in terms of a global mechanism where you can actually buy the ideas, or you can lease these ideas, licence them and then make them available to the developing countries as public goods. That is possible as far as we are concerned. Also, it means that if we are looking for creating transformational technologies for the future, can we create a global platform on which developed as well as developing countries can work together so that in ten to fifteen years' time they can really generate those kinds of transformational technologies. Even though we are a developing country we have some modest scientific and technical resources available. We are willing to bring that to the table. To answer the other part of your question, we have no difficulty in engaging in collaboration which comes up with technologies which can then be distributed as public goods. We have benefited from this in the past ourselves. We have no hesitation in taking that route now as far as climate change is concerned.

Question: If I can turn this around and ask you a question from the ground up, if I am an average Indian citizen and my energy consumption is only modest, actually dismal, what am I being asked to give up? What should I be prepared for? What is my Government going to commit me to do in Copenhagen and thereafter?

Special Envoy: Very simply, no Government in India will commit its citizens to a prospect of not being able to meet the very basic energy requirements that 400 million people in India today confront. This is the argument that we are giving that you cannot separate the issue of action on climate change from the larger developmental context. We are prepared to do whatever is possible. It makes sense for us to do many of these things. But the bottom line is that there should not be an impact on our developmental prospects, on our ability to continue to deal with poverty in our country, to deal with many issues which are survival issues not just issues of lifestyle. This particular aspect is today perhaps better understood outside. When we talk about 400 million Indians not having access to basic energy services, if I can make an effort to meet those requirements to the extent possible, not through burning fossil fuels but through renewable energy, yes, I will try because it makes sense. In many areas in India perhaps taking the grid is not a viable proposition. But distributing for example solar lighting systems, solar heating systems may be a viable alternative. So, we are willing to look at that. Actually we have a plan precisely to spread the use of solar lighting systems in very large parts of rural India. Those are the kinds of things that we are prepared to do. In that respect obviously if there is a favourable global climate regime, it will enable us to do much more than what we can do on our own.

Question: I just want to know whether the developed countries ...(Inaudible)... whether they again made a case for sectoral emission cuts and whether there is a possibility of India ever accepting this demand?

Special Envoy: Let me make it very clear that we have no difficulty in terms of creating a global platform for sharing of best practices on a sectoral basis. For example, whether it is the iron and steel industry or the cement industry, there are best practices in developed countries but by the way there are also best practices in India. There are some very efficient units in India too. There are very efficient iron and steel industries in India as well. We have no problem in terms of placing this on a global platform where we can all benefit from this. But, problem arises when you say, "We are going to set internationally-binding norms for industries; and those who are not up to the norm, in order to bring about some kind of a level-playing field, this could be the basis for, for example, equalising carbon tariffs". That is the route that we are not ready to travel on. We have to first understand what really is meant by a sectoral approach. Are you talking about a sectoral approach which really involves the sharing of best practices amongst countries? We have no difficulty with that. If you are going to say, "Let us do joint projects for improving energy efficiency in certain areas", yes, certainly we have no problem with that. We are already doing a joint project with Japan in terms of improving efficiency of coal-based power. That is a very good joint project. But we draw the line when you say, "We cannot agree perhaps on national targets, but can we not agree upon internationally-binding sectoral targets which then be opening the door to protectionism under agreement", that is not what we are prepared to accept.

Thank you very much, indeed. Thank you.

093. Question relevant to Climate Change answered by Prime Minister at his press conference held on the conclusion of the G-20 Summit.

Pittsburg, September 25, 2009.

Question: Mr. Prime Minister, to expand a little bit on the climate change issue, there is a speech by President Hu at the United Nations talking a little bit about climate change. There is only about two months' time left before Copenhagen. Are you optimistic about reaching an agreement at Copenhagen? And what actions could either developed or developing countries take to reach an outcome?

Prime Minister: Let me say that I am not an astrologer. There are difficulties. On the signs of climate change, now there is a broad agreement. But how to bring about the adjustments in emissions is a complicated matter which requires an exercise in burden-sharing. There is no agreement about the rules of the game as to how this burden-sharing is to be brought about. Developing countries are of the view that the major responsibility for bringing about this situation is that of the developed countries and, therefore, they should carry out credible action in order to control emissions; and that if the developing countries are required to take any national action, for that financial resources as well as technological support should be provided. There is a broad, vague agreement that any agreement in which developing countries are also required to take any national action will have to be accompanied by credible action on the part of developed countries by way of additional provision of finance and also in ensuring flow of technologies at affordable price. But other than expressing a pious wish with regard to the success of the framework convention meeting in Copenhagen, the Group of 20 did not go into the mechanics of these things.

094. Extract Relevant to Climate Change from the Communique issued by the Leaders of the G-20 at the end of their Summit deliberations.

Pittsburg, September 25, 2009.

Energy Security and Climate Change

28. Access to diverse, reliable, affordable and clean energy is critical for sustainable growth. Inefficient markets and excessive volatility negatively affect both producers and consumers. Noting the St. Petersburg Principles on Global Energy Security, which recognize the shared interest of energy producing, consuming and transiting countries in promoting global energy security, we individually and collectively commit to:

- Increase energy market transparency and market stability by publishing complete, accurate, and timely data on oil production, consumption, refining and stock levels, as appropriate, on a regular basis, ideally monthly, beginning by January 2010. We note the Joint Oil Data Initiative as managed by the International Energy Forum (IEF) and welcome their efforts to examine the expansion of their data collection to natural gas.

We will improve our domestic capabilities to collect energy data and improve energy demand and supply forecasting and ask the International Energy Agency (IEA) and the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to ramp up their efforts to assist interested countries in developing those capabilities. We will strengthen the producer-consumer dialogue to improve our understanding of market fundamentals, including supply and demand trends, and price volatility, and note the work of the IEF experts group.

- Improve regulatory oversight of energy markets by implementing the International Organization of Securities Commissions (IOSCO) recommendations on commodity futures markets and calling on relevant regulators to collect data on large concentrations of trader positions on oil in our national commodities futures markets. We ask our relevant regulators to report back at our next meeting on progress towards implementation. We will direct relevant regulators to also collect related data on over-the-counter oil markets and to take steps to combat market manipulation leading to excessive price volatility.

We call for further refinement and improvement of commodity market information, including through the publication of more detailed and disaggregated data, coordinated as far as possible internationally. We ask IOSCO to help national governments design and implement these policies, conduct further analysis including with regard with to excessive volatility, make specific recommendations, and to report regularly on our progress.

29. Enhancing our energy efficiency can play an important, positive role in promoting energy security and fighting climate change. Inefficient fossil fuel subsidies encourage wasteful consumption, distort markets, impede investment in clean energy sources and undermine efforts to deal with climate change. The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) and the IEA have found that eliminating fossil fuel subsidies by 2020 would reduce global greenhouse gas emissions in 2050 by ten percent. Many countries are reducing fossil fuel subsidies while preventing adverse impact on the poorest. Building on these efforts and recognizing the challenges of populations suffering from energy poverty, we commit to:

- Rationalize and phase out over the medium term inefficient fossil fuel subsidies that encourage wasteful consumption. As we do that, we recognize the importance of providing those in need with essential energy services, including through the use of targeted cash transfers and other appropriate mechanisms. This reform will not apply to our support for clean energy, renewables, and technologies that dramatically reduce greenhouse gas emissions. We will have our Energy and Finance Ministers, based on their national circumstances, develop implementation strategies and timeframes, and report back to Leaders at the next Summit. We ask the international financial institutions to offer support to countries in this process. We call on all nations to adopt policies that will phase out such subsidies worldwide.

30. We request relevant institutions, such as the IEA, OPEC, OECD, and World Bank, provide an analysis of the scope of energy subsidies and suggestions for the implementation of this initiative and report back at the next summit.

31. Increasing clean and renewable energy supplies, improving energy efficiency, and promoting conservation are critical steps to protect our environment, promote sustainable growth and address the threat of climate change. Accelerated adoption of economically sound clean and renewable energy technology and energy efficiency measures diversifies our energy supplies and strengthens our energy security. We commit to:

- Stimulate investment in clean energy, renewables, and energy efficiency and provide financial and technical support for such projects in developing countries.
- Take steps to facilitate the diffusion or transfer of clean energy technology including by conducting joint research and building capacity. The reduction or elimination of barriers to trade and investment in this area are being discussed and should be pursued on a voluntary basis and in appropriate fora.

32. As leaders of the world's major economies, we are working for a resilient, sustainable, and green recovery. We underscore anew our resolve to take strong action to address the threat of dangerous climate change. We reaffirm the objective, provisions, and principles of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), including common but differentiated responsibilities. We note the principles endorsed by Leaders at the Major Economies Forum in L'Aquila, Italy. We will intensify our efforts, in cooperation with other parties, to reach agreement in Copenhagen through the UNFCCC negotiation. An agreement must include mitigation, adaptation, technology, and financing.

33. We welcome the work of the Finance Ministers and direct them to report back at their next meeting with a range of possible options for climate change financing to be provided as a resource to be considered in the UNFCCC negotiations at Copenhagen.

095. Media Interaction of Minister of Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh after launching the refurbished website of the Ministry.

New Delhi, September 29, 2009.

Minister for Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh told journalists on September 29 that "India will walk out" of the Copenhagen Climate Change summit to be held in December this year (2009) if the Western world insisted on enforcing any kind of legal bindings on emission trajectory. He said the European nations were adopting a fundamentalist approach, which was destroying the Copenhagen agenda. "There is no question of monitoring, reporting and verification (MRV) for domestic projects and actions. We are open to this idea for internationally funded projects... something which has been even stated by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh time and again. There is no weakening of India's position and our initiatives will only give us the required strength to negotiate in the international forum," said Mr. Ramesh.

He said MRV for domestic projects was totally unacceptable. "Where we are getting international finance and technology, we can certainly consider a role for MRV. That's reasonable. But MRV is certainly not agreeable for our National Action Plan for Climate Change," he said. He said the decision to submit regular reports to the United Nations on domestic climate change actions was nothing new. "We were doing it every six years and now it will be done on a more regular basis. There is no weakening of our stand nor are we going to succumb to any pressure on such issues."

Mr. Ramesh said that for India adaptation measures were more fundamental than mitigation. For all this, technology was going to be critical. "We are holding a Climate Change and Technology Conference in New Delhi on October 22-23, 2009 with 190 countries participating. This will be one of our major contributions to Copenhagen. GDP does not mean gross domestic product; it means green domestic product. Unless we start to think of green economic growth, our growth will not be sustainable." Replying to a question, Mr. Ramesh said India would not take on legally binding emission reduction targets. "We will not get into it because our per capita emissions are low. We have eight points that are non-negotiable. India continues to lay emphasis on per capita emissions. The two-degree goal is new but no quantitative figures have been given."

* Meanwhile a media report in the Hindu of September 30th said that the EU Ambassador Ms. Daniel Smadja had a meeting with EU-member countries' Ambassadors in New Delhi to consider the subject of Climate Change. She said the EU did not expect India to bind its emissions reduction, but wanted it to have its own national plan that could be part of a treaty. The EU, she said, was looking at quantifying targets and encouraged by Minister of State for Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh's statement that New Delhi would be part of the solution. She said an equivalent to the WTO-term NAMA, which elaborates as Nationally Appropriate Mitigating Action, was needed whereby developing nations could quantify the standards and put them on the table. The EU representatives said India, China and Brazil would have a major role in joining the international effort to contribute towards mitigating the effects of climate change. "The developed countries have a historic responsibility, and we agree. That is why the EU has committed unconditionally to cut its emissions to at least 20 per cent below 1990 levels by 2020 and take it to 30 per cent if other [industrialised] countries agree," French Ambassador Jerome Bonnafont said. The EU was not asking the developing countries to reduce emissions but to control their growth. If a developing country agreed to control emissions by a certain percentage, the goal should be binding. He suggested that verification could be part of the process with financial support and clean technology forming part of the negotiating package. The EU, Ms. Smadja said, had accepted that by 2020, its member-states would affect a 20 per cent cut in emissions; use 20 per cent of the renewable energies; and improve energy efficiency by 20 per cent. It also estimated that at least • 100 billion would be needed each year under the financial package for the developing countries. Of this, 20 to 40 per cent would come from domestic funding, 40 p.c. from global markets and the rest from international public finance depending on emission cuts and the capacity to pay.

096. Opening Statement by the Special Envoy of the Prime Minister Shyam Saran at the Press Conference in Bangkok.

Bangkok, October 9, 2009

Dear Friends and Representatives of the Media,

I welcome this opportunity to meet the distinguished members of the media and to share with you our assessment of the current state of play in the ongoing negotiations leading up to Copenhagen. This will be a brief opening statement so that we have more time for interaction and give you an opportunity to pose any question that you may have.

The talks being held at Bangkok in the two tracks are critical to the success of the Climate Conference that will be held in Copenhagen later this year. While there is progress in the consolidation of texts in the Working Group on Long-Term Cooperative Action, further work will be necessary on substantive issues. We have achieved greater congruence of views on adaptation. On technology, we have been able to advance towards a shared perspective, though as yet in broad terms, on the institutional framework and the nature of activities that we need to pursue, including capacity building. These are encouraging milestones as we head towards Copenhagen.

However, the picture in the second track, the Kyoto Protocol track, has gone in the reverse direction. It had been our expectation that our developed country partners will announce deep and ambitious emission reduction targets in the course of these talks in the run up to Copenhagen. We have, however, been dismayed by the lack of willingness on the part of several of our developed country partners to move in this direction. Developed country parties to the Kyoto Protocol should have announced their respective individual and overall emission reduction targets for the second commitment period, commencing in 2013. Those who had not joined the Kyoto Protocol should have announced comparable commitments, as had been agreed upon in the Bali Action Plan.

It is a matter of regret that several Annex I countries are unlikely to meet their emission reduction obligations set for the first commitment period. And it is a matter of even deeper concern that there has been no progress on achieving the key objectives of our negotiations, that is the announcement of the second commitment period targets, which must be of a scale equal to the challenge we face from global climate change. Except for a few countries like Japan and Norway, the individual targets that have been indicated so far fall far short of what is required, and now there are inadmissible attempts to abandon the Protocol altogether. We hope that by the time we return to Barcelona in November, this unsatisfactory state of affairs will change. A Copenhagen outcome without clarity on this important issue is unlikely.

At this penultimate stage of our negotiations, new concepts and instruments have been proposed, which taken together, would mean firstly, the setting aside of the Kyoto Protocol altogether; secondly, the diminishing rather than enhancing of the level of commitment as well as ambition with regard to mitigation; and thirdly, the rewriting of key principles and provisions of the UNFCCC itself. As you would appreciate, this is not the mandate we agreed upon by consensus at Bali.

India takes the challenge of climate change seriously and has undertaken a number of significant policy measures to address both mitigation and adaptation. As part of our National Action Plan on Climate Change, we have recently finalised two of the eight National Missions included in the Plan. These are the National Solar Mission and the National Mission on Enhanced Energy Efficiency. Both have ambitious goals and will constitute an important contribution to the global action on climate change. Other Missions will be finalized shortly in the meetings of the Prime Minister's Council on Climate Change. India's Minister of Environment and Forest, Mr. Jairam Ramesh has, in recent statements, indicated the significant scale of ambition these Missions represent. He has also conveyed flexibility in the manner in which information on these climate actions could be made available to the international community within the framework of the UNFCCC.

I would like to inform you that on October 22 and 23, 2009, India is convening a Conference on Technology and Development related to climate change in New Delhi in collaboration with the United Nations. A large number of Ministers and senior officers from across the world will be attending the conference, which will be inaugurated by the Prime Minister of India. The President of the Maldives will be the Chief Guest and will deliver the keynote address. We welcome you to this important event and this is our hope that the conference will make a contribution to advancing our work on the road to Copenhagen.

India, as always, will continue to play a positive and constructive role in the on-going negotiations and will make every effort possible to ensure a successful outcome at Copenhagen*.

* On October 7 Mr. Saran had told the Indian journalists in Bangkok that India strongly opposed "the concerted efforts to put the Kyoto Protocol aside." "They can't unilaterally do this by backdoor methods," he said. "There has to be some comparability between the US and EU commitments. Now there is uncertainty regarding law, scope and nature of commitments." He complained that "Nothing is going on," regarding the US not setting emission targets and committing funds for developing countries to combat climate change before the UN climate treaty is renegotiated in Copenhagen in December. He expressed India's opposition to industrial countries' demand that major developing countries should also accept emission cuts. "The US, as the world's largest economy and emitter, has to take the lead," he emphasized. A EU delegate indicated that it was prepared to go along with a US proposal to "widen the participation" of developing countries and have a single legal instrument to replace the Kyoto Protocol which included the US and "large developing country emitters". Senior G77 members walked out of a meeting in Bangkok during climate talks saying they would not discuss a future without the Kyoto Protocol.

097. Press Release issued by the Prime Minister's Office on the meeting of the National Mission on Strategic Knowledge for Climate Change.

New Delhi, October 13, 2009.

The Prime Minister chaired a meeting of the National Council on Climate Change to give shape to the National Mission on Strategic Knowledge for Climate Change. Dr. Manmohan Singh underlined the importance of developing our own skills, knowledge and capacities in the science of climate change. In particular the Prime Minister stressed that as we find ourselves having to engage with the global community on climate change, it was necessary to have the ability to prepare and read scientific data related to climate change. He cautioned against compartmentalized thinking in various concerned ministries and suggested an integrated approach to capacity building.

The meeting emphasized the importance of building a vibrant and dynamic knowledge system for effectively promoting ecologically sustainable development with the NMSKCC working as a service mission of the National Action Plan on Climate Change. It outlined the objectives of the Mission as networking existing knowledge institutions for exchange and sharing of data, building institutional and human capacities and improving the understanding of key climate processes and climate risks. The Mission would also define sustainability pathways and work towards building alliances and partnerships through global pathways.

The mission serviced by the Science and Technology Ministry will seek to build synergy with the NATCOM process of the Ministry of Environment and Forests. The Science and Technology Ministry was asked to incorporate the suggestions made by the civil society representatives, who had forcefully pointed out that the success of the Mission would hinge on a public - private partnership. The civil society representatives also emphasized that this Mission should plan its strategies only after reaching out to the public.

The meeting was attended by the Finance Minister, The Deputy Chairman Planning Commission, Minister of State for Environment and Forests, Chairman - Economic Advisory Council, Chairman - National Manufacturing Competitiveness Council, Foreign Secretary, Secretary Science and Technology, Dr. R.K. Pachauri, Director General -TERI, and other non-official members of the Council on Climate Change.

098. Statement issued by the Minister of State in the Ministry of Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh clarifying his position with reference to reports appearing in the media about the Note he sent to the Prime Minister setting the negotiating position on Climate Change.

New Delhi, October 20, 2009.

Yesterday, a leading newspaper had carried a news-item* on a discussion note that I wrote on climate change. The news-item has quoted only partially and selectively from this note, and significantly added its own editorial interpretations, thereby completely distorting and twisting its meaning. Let me reiterate India's non-negotiables in the ongoing international climate change negotiations.

While India is prepared to discuss and make public periodically the implementation of its National Action Plan on climate change, India will never accept internationally legally binding emission reduction targets or commitments as part of any agreement or deal or outcome. India will never accept any dilution or renegotiation of the provisions and principles of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC). In particular, we will never agree to the elimination of the distinction between developed ("Annex I") countries and developing ("non-Annex I") countries as far as internationally legally binding emission reduction obligations are concerned. Internationally legally binding emission reduction targets are for developed countries and developed countries alone, as globally agreed under the Bali Action Plan.

* The daily Times of India on October 19 carried a news item purporting to be quoting from the letter claimed to have been written by Minister Jairam Ramesh to the Prime Minister suggesting that he had asked the Prime Minister to 'junk the Kyoto Protocol, de-link itself from G77 -- the 131-member bloc of developing nations -- and take on greenhouse gas emission reduction commitments under a new deal without any counter guarantee of finances and technology'. The news item said the minister justified the proposed shift of gears arguing that India need not be seen as a deal-breaker and should try to curb emissions in its own interest. The paper said If the proposal of the Minister was accepted by the government, 'it would radically shift India's stand away from its position on climate negotiations that governments of all political hues have backed since 1990 and which was defended robustly as recently as at the UN talks in Bangkok earlier this month'. The report further claimed that the Minister's letter said to have been written on October 13 argued for a deviation from the Kyoto Protocol under which only the developed countries -- listed in Annexure 1 -- are required to take obligations for emission cuts, suggesting that it would also help in a better alignment with the US. "We must welcome initiatives to India will agree to consider international measurement, reporting and verification ("MRV") of its mitigation actions only when such actions are enabled and supported by international finance and technology.

India, like other developing countries, fully expects developed countries to fulfill their obligations on transfer of technology and financial transfer that they committed to under the UNFCCC and the Bali Action for both mitigation and adaptation actions.

There has always been a broad political consensus regarding the Indian position on climate change. India has been engaged in climate change negotiations, whether in UNFCCC or multilateral fora, based on a clear and definite brief which has not changed since 2004.

bring the US into the mainstream, if need be through a special mechanism, without diluting basic Annex 1/non-Annex distinctions. If the Australian Proposal of a schedule maintains this basic distinction and nature of differential obligations we should have no great theological objections," the letter was claimed to have said. In the lengthy report the paper said: "The minister has also suggested diluting India's strong stance -- enshrined in the UN Framework Convention on Climate Convention (UNFCCC) -- on demanding compensation from the industrialized countries in terms of funds and technology for having caused the climate change problem to begin with. "The position we take on international mitigation commitments only if supported by finance and technology needs to be nuanced simply because we need to mitigate in self-interest," the Minister was reported to have suggested.

The Times of India commenting said 'Besides their radical import, his proposals are significant because they come just a week after India vigorously stuck to its known negotiating guns at the Bangkok round of negotiations. The UN talks in the Thai capital saw India leading the attack by G77 and China on the Australian Proposal which the environment minister now favours in his letter to the PM.'

The Times of India report created a sort of political storm and the political parties were unsparing in their criticism of the Minister's suggestions as appearing in the paper. Media reports said that the Prime Minister's Office was particularly unhappy and took the stand that the Minister's proposals merely reflected his personal views.

On October 21, the Times of India quoted an officer of the PMO who was also on the PM's Council on Climate Change to say that 'he was happy with the clarification the PMO had given'. He said, "In my view, the PMO has clarified the position in a timely and welcome manner. It is now clear that the document in question is only a note for discussion, not official policy. It has also been clarified that there will be no shift except on the basis of consensus and with the sanction of Parliament. This is most appropriate since our climate change policy has always been based on national consensus."

The Communist Party Marxist Politburo said "The minister's letter is a complete move away from country's basic positions and seems only to focus on strategically aligning India with the US on climate policy and breaking ranks with the entire bloc of developing countries." The Bharatiya Janata Party leader and Leader of Opposition in Parliament Arun Jaitley deplored the "effort to alter India's negotiating position on climate change" calling it an act of sabotage. "Is the Environment minister giving his personal views or is

My note suggested the possibility of some flexibility in India's stance, keeping the above non-negotiable firmly intact and keeping India irrevocably anchored in the UNFCCC of 1992 and the Bali Action Plan of 2007. I have never at any stage considered or advocated abandoning the fundamental tenets of the Kyoto Protocol, as was stated in the article- this is a mischievous interpretation of the newspaper. My basic point is that India's interests and India's interests alone shall dictate at our negotiating stance. As far as the insinuations by the newspaper that I am reflecting a pro-US bias, I will let my actions speak for themselves. India is working, and will continue to work, closely with our partners in the G-77 and China in articulating a common position on this issue, while also engaging with other countries to our benefit.

I had written a comprehensive 7-page letter to a large number of MPs from all political parties and to all Chief ministers in early October 2009 detailing our thinking, making our position very clear and stating that accountability for our actions on Climate change-through outcome-based legislation, if found acceptable by our Parliament-is to our Parliament and to our Parliament alone. I welcome the feedback that I have been receiving on it. Earlier, in August, I had written to the Speaker of the Lok Sabha suggesting that four Member of Parliament-based on posts that they hold-be included in the official delegation to the UNFCCC Conference of Parties (COP-15) to be held at Copenhagen in December, 2009. I will continue to keep political leadership across party lines and civil society fully engaged on this issue over the coming weeks and months.

he stalking horse on behalf of a larger lobby. If these are his personal views, can he continue as India's key negotiator? But if he is a trial balloon for a larger lobby, the issue acquires even greater seriousness. It is, in that event, UPA's Diwali gift to the US and other developed countries at the cost of India's poor". Mr. Abhishek Singhvi the Spokesperson of main constituent of the ruling Alliance, the Congress party in distancing the party from the Minister's statement said: "Let us be very clear that clarification in this regard will have to be sought either from the Minister or the PMO-it is not a matter about which the party would like to say anything."

099. Delhi Statement on Cooperation in Environment among the SAARC member countries adopted at the SAARC Conference on Environment.

New Delhi, October 20, 2009.

The Ministers of Environment of the Member States of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) met in New Delhi, India on 20th October 2009 for the Eighth Meeting of the SAARC Environment Ministers.

Recognizing that one of the mandates of SAARC is to promote and support the protection, management and enhancement of the environment in the South Asian region;

Convinced that SAARC could benefit from exchange of the accumulated positive experience, strengthened regional dialogue and adopting a collaborative regional approach to tackling common environmental problems;

Emphasizing that SAARC can play an important role in carrying out collective action to address these challenges for mutual benefit and the common good;

Underscoring the need to substantively enhance regional cooperation as per SAARC principles on matters related to the environment.

Hereby adopt the Delhi Statement on Cooperation in Environment: Environmental Planning & Management

1. The Ministers recognized the critical importance of effective planning and management of environmental protection systems, including environmental pollution, and conservation of aquatic and marine ecosystems. They emphasized the need for cooperation in devising measures to develop capability for enhanced environmental management.
2. The Ministers appreciated and acknowledged the support of India in SAARC Meteorological Research Centre (SMRC) and reaffirmed the decision of SMRC to set up a network of SAARC weather stations to monitor weather patterns, especially storms, across the member states, starting with the establishment of fifty automatic weather stations, three GPS Sonda Stations and a Doppler Radar in Nepal, Bhutan and Bangladesh in the first phase. Afghanistan and Pakistan would be covered in second phase with Maldives and Sri Lanka in the third phase. They directed that the deployment of this network across other member states be accelerated.

3. The Ministers agreed to accelerate consultations between the apex environmental management and pollution control agencies of the Member States ("apex group"), and directed that they develop a Regional Cooperation Plan on environmental management and pollution control within a period of six months from the date of adoption of this statement.

Biodiversity and Afforestation

4. The Ministers noted the critical need to conserve, preserve, rehabilitate and protect the rich, varied and unique biodiversity of the South Asia region. They noted the need for biodiversity protection and regulation, including through scientific methods.

5. The Ministers re-affirmed the importance of the region's forests as a unique treasure, both for their rich biodiversity and for the livelihood they provide to the forest-dependent people of South Asia. They emphasized the need to give a new impetus to afforestation and the sustainable management of forests and its resources, including through communitybased methods.

6. The Ministers emphasized the need to identify transboundary biodiversity zones and develop a framework for transboundary biodiversity conservation, including exploration of potential biodiversity conservation corridors. The Ministers directed the Technical Committee on Environment to examine the Concept and develop a framework for consideration of member states within a period of six months thereof.

7. The Ministers underlined the need for afforestation and sustainable management of forests to be an integral part of any agreement on forestry that is concluded under the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC). They emphasized that the "REDD Plus" proposal before the UNFCCC is an appropriate basis for such an agreement.

Climate Change

8. The Ministers recognized that the South Asia was amongst the regions most vulnerable to climate change. They stressed that sustainable development and adaptation to Climate Change remained the appropriate way to address the threat of climate change. They agreed that it was central, including through acceleration of the development process, to build up capacity in the region to cope with the extreme weather events and other adverse effects of climate change.

9. The Ministers recalled the SAARC Declaration on Climate Change adopted by the Twenty-ninth Session of the Council of Ministers held in New Delhi on 7-8 December 2007, and emphasized the SAARC Action Plan on Climate Change adopted by the SAARC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change held in Dhaka held on 3 July 2008, wherein specific areas of possible actions by the Member States were identified.

10. The Ministers welcomed the proposal by Bhutan to adopt 'Climate Change' as the key theme of the Sixteenth SAARC Summit to be held in Thimpu in April 2010 and also noted the concept paper prepared for the Summit.

11. The Ministers underlined the crucial importance of close cooperation in the run-up to the UN Climate Change Conference of Parties (COP-15) in Copenhagen, with a view to enabling the full, effective and sustained implementation of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC). They also underscored the need to fully implement the commitments under the Convention in accordance with its principles, especially that of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

12. The Ministers also noted the importance of the High Level Conference on Technology Development and Transfer organized by the Government of India in cooperation with UNDESA and expressed hope that this will be an important contribution to the agreed outcomes at Copenhagen.

13. The Ministers recommended that the Member States may undertake cooperation with respect to adaptation, supported with resources as mutually agreed, to address the adverse effects of climate change.

14. In particular, the Ministers underscored the need to undertake and enhance cooperation in areas related to environment amongst the Member States in order to have a coordinated response to climate change. To this end, the Ministers agreed to institutionalize an annual workshop - a South Asia Workshop on Climate Change Actions (SAWCCA). The Ministers welcomed the offer of the Government of India to host the first workshop in early 2010.

Cross-cutting measures for cooperation

15. The Ministers further agreed on a series of cross-cutting measures for mutual cooperation between Member States across areas of the environment:

- Strengthen mechanisms at policy, practice and implementation level to take better account of the indirect, induced, cross-sectoral and crossboundary impacts, based on best practices available in SAARC region and beyond;
- Identify and create opportunities for activities achievable through regional cooperation and south-south support in terms of technology and knowledge transfer;
- Agree to continued sharing of experience within SAARC for development of common approach to the environmental challenges; through workshops, seminars, conferences and expositions, training programmes and to foster the regional cooperation on priority environmental issues;
- Exchange Students and Faculty between Universities and Research Institutions of Member States.

16. The Ministers took note of the Draft SAARC Treaty on Cooperation in the field of Environment, and directed that an Inter-governmental Expert Group Meeting be convened at an early date to discuss and finalize the draft Treaty for signature at the forthcoming Sixteenth SAARC Summit.

17. The Ministers directed that the draft SAARC Agreement on Natural Disaster Rapid Response Mechanism be finalized for signing at the Sixteenth SAARC Summit at Thimphu, Bhutan, in April, 2010.

18. The Ministers appreciated the offer by the Government of India to provide US$ 1 million each to the SAARC Forestry Centre, Thimphu and the SAARC Coastal Zone Management Centre, Malé to strengthen those Centres.

19. The Ministers expressed deep appreciation to the Government of India for hosting the Eighth Meeting of the SAARC Environment Ministers and for the warm hospitality extended to all the delegations.

100. Agreement between the Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China on Cooperation on Addressing Climate Change.

New Delhi, October 21, 2009.

The Government of the Republic of India and the Government of the People's Republic of China (hereinafter referred to as "the Two Sides"),

Desirous of further promoting friendship between India and China,

Acknowledging that climate change and its adverse effects are the common concern of humankind, which need to be addressed through international co-operation,

Emphasising that the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and its Kyoto Protocol are the most appropriate framework for addressing climate change,

101. Address by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the New Delhi High Level Conference on 'Climate Change: Technology Development & Transfer'.

New Delhi, October 22, 2009.

I am very pleased to be here in your midst today to inaugurate this very important Conference. I extend a very warm welcome to His Excellency President Nasheed of the Maldives. Mr. President, you are a respected friend of our country and an untiring champion of global cooperation to address this formidable challenge of climate change. You are very welcome in both your capacities. I also extend a very warm welcome to all the distinguished Ministers and other participants at this Conference.

Developing countries face critical challenges in enhancing their capacity to adapt to climate change. President Nasheed has been most eloquent champion in raising awareness across the world of the threat to the survival of small island states from global warming.

In our country, we are deeply conscious of the vulnerability faced by least developed countries and island states. We too have large and vulnerable populations living in our island chains and in low-lying coastal areas. Whatever modest capabilities we possess to tackle this problem will be at the disposal of countries like the Maldives.

The challenge before the developing world is how to achieve our developmental goals while at the same time minimising ecological costs.

Developing countries cannot and will not compromise on development. But as responsible members of the global community we also do recognise that we, along with other members of the global community, must do our bit to keep our emissions footprint within levels that are sustainable and equitable.

Technology and its diffusion will be a key element in meeting the challenge of climate change.

The key issue before us is that of developing the appropriate technologies and then collapsing the time from their first commercialization to their large-scale adoption in poorer developing countries. We need technology solutions that are appropriate, that are affordable and that are truly effective.

They have to be backed by the establishment of appropriate financial arrangements to facilitate technology transfers. Industrialized countries have the capacity to shift to new energy efficient processes even if it involves additional costs. Developing countries do not have this capacity and it is therefore only appropriate that the shift in their case should be facilitated by adequate financial support. Hopefully as the new technology spreads more widely the costs involved will fall making it much more affordable. Initially however, the transition in developing countries will need critical financial support.

The United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change should play a leading role in directing effective and collaborative actions in this vital area.

We believe that continuation of the process of incentivizing the adoption of climate friendly technologies in developing countries in the second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol should be a priority global concern.

The Clean Development Mechanism under the Kyoto Protocol has proved to be an effective vehicle for promoting sustainable development in many developing countries, while helping developed countries accomplish the abatement of their GHG emissions at lower cost. CDM revenues often take some of the sting out of the risks associated with the introduction and adoption of newer and cleaner technologies.

Climate friendly and environmentally sound technologies should be viewed as global public goods. This implies that the IPR regime applied to those goods should balance rewards for innovators with the need to promote the common good of humankind. Suitable mechanisms must be found that will provide incentives for developing new technologies while also facilitating their deployment in developing countries at affordable cost.

Such an approach has been adopted successfully in the case of pharmaceutical technologies for the benefit of HIV/AIDS victims in developing countries. The moral case of a similar approach for protecting our planet and its life support system is equally compelling.

An important barrier to technology adoption is the poor absorptive capacities of large number of developing countries. This situation cannot be remedied through forced harmonization of standards. We have to strengthen the limited innovation capabilities in many countries to realize the potential of these new technologies.

India has proposed the setting up of an international network of Climate Innovation Centres (CICs) which should act as vehicles for enhancing technology innovation and capacity building in developing countries.

These Centres could assess and identify locally-relevant key technologies and support their successful and faster development and deployment. Each such centre could focus on a key technological product that addresses climate change. Their task may also include addressing the diverse range of capacity, business and regulatory barriers to the development and diffusion of the specific technologies. The CICs in different countries may also cross-fertilize each other by sharing of "learning-by-doing" experience.

India's development path has been relatively benign from the climate change perspective thus far. Our per capita consumption of primary energy is less than one-fourth of the world average and our per capita emission of CO<sub>2</sub> is among the lowest in the world. Moreover, the energy intensity of our output has been continuously declining in the last 30 years.

Nevertheless, as GDP rises, our energy use and total emissions will rise unless new technology enables us to increase energy efficiency and reduce emissions intensity.

I have stated earlier that we stand committed to ensure that our per capita carbon emissions will never exceed the average of the per capita carbon emissions of developed countries. Equating GHG emissions across nations on a per capita basis is the only just and fair basis for a long-term global arrangement on climate change which is truly equitable.

I have no doubt that if developed countries make a serious effort to bring their per capita emissions within tolerable levels, they will unleash large resources directed towards research. This will generate an upsurge of technology that will make it much easier for other countries to follow suit.

Meanwhile, we are acting to do what we can within our limited capacity. We are committed to further evolving and pursuing our sustainable growth strategy for reasons of our own vital national interests. India will adopt purposive domestic actions to enhance its climate change management. The focus of our efforts will be targeted towards achieving time-bound outcomes related to the energy efficiency of our economy, the share of renewable in our fuel mix and several other sector specific initiatives.

These objectives are reflected in our National Action Plan on Climate Change which contains 8 National Missions focussing on both mitigation and adaptation.

Needless to say, a comprehensive, balanced and above all, an equitable outcome at Copenhagen will enable us to do much more in all these areas.

As we move towards Copenhagen, we must keep to the mandate for our deliberations agreed upon by consensus at Bali. Our objective is to enhance the implementation of the principles and provisions of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

We need to work towards a significantly enhanced and scaled-up set of arrangements for technology under a multilaterally supervised mechanism. We need to act across all the stages of the technology cycle - from research leading to new breakthroughs, to the development & adoption of new technologies and to the transfer of existing & mature technologies.

We should endeavour to create a global platform to bring together the best scientific and technological resources from across the world in a collaborative effort to deliver transformational technologies for the future. We have good examples to guide us, including the ITER project or fusion energy project and the work of the Consultative Group on International Agricultural Research (CGIAR).

The expectations from your Conference are indeed very high. People everywhere, both within our governments and civil society at large, will keenly follow your deliberations. I assure you that India will do its utmost to play a constructive role in global efforts to combat climate change.

102. Summary from the Chair of the Delhi High Level Conference on 'Climate Change: Technology Development and Transfer'.

New Delhi, October 23, 2009.

Dear Colleagues,

1. This brings us to the conclusion of the Delhi Conference on Climate Change: Technology Development and Transfer 2009. Before I close the conference, may I share the joint impressions of Ambassador Sha Zukang and myself as the co-hosts of the conference, on what we have learned during the last two days?
2. First, I am sure you will agree with us that this was a highly successful conference. This was largely because of your sustained and thoughtful engagement. We have had the pleasure of hosting 58 delegations, of which 30 were at the ministerial or vice ministerial level. Their Excellencies, the Prime Minister of India and the President of the Maldives graced the inaugural session with their presence and gave us much to consider. The Finance Minister of India also graciously joined us to inaugurate the Clean Technology Exhibition organized by CII with the involvement of 148 companies from around the world. We were joined by around 30 experts who shared their knowledge of key aspects of technology transfer and deployment. More importantly, the discussions and engagement by the participants were consistently of a high order. This has enabled us to agree on a Delhi Statement, which I hope would help advance the discussions at Barcelona and later at Copenhagen.
3. On substance we have also learned a few things, reiterated a few things, and disagreed on a few things.
4. Perhaps the most important lesson we will take away from this conference is that there is no point in talking about technology development and transfer in the abstract. We must become more specific, with regard to place, with regard to technologies and with regard to mechanisms. We need to think concretely how we can join our hands together to put in place international cooperative mechanism for technology development and transfer. We have to address the concerns regarding technology transfer and development, insufficient R&D, and the barriers arising from inadequate funding, weak capacity, market failure, and policy distortions.
5. I want to mention first the message of his Excellency President Nasheed as well as the Distinguished Minister from Mauritius, both of whom reminded us of the vulnerability of the small island developing states. Speaking for myself, I am greatly moved by their statements. It should reinforce our commitment to take rapid action on climate change, both on mitigation and adaptation, not only to enable vulnerable countries to cope, but to ensure that they will not be confronted with the most tragic of choices.

6. On specific technologies, as you know, the last two days heavily emphasized renewable energy technologies. More importantly, a consistent theme, which got repeated several times, was that the only sure way of addressing the climate challenge is to make such technologies affordable by poor countries and poor communities. These technologies are currently too expensive, and although many developing countries, including India, are investing heavily in them, the urgent need is to speed up this process through far more extensive international cooperation and technology transfer.

7. We have also learned, and this idea was also repeated by several speakers, including experts as well as Ministers or other delegation members, is that the quickest way of lowering the cost of many renewable options is to scale up their rate of deployment and diffusion in developing countries, the green technology accelerator, as one delegate called it, or the quantum leap in renewable energy deployment, as another one phrased it. This will require international cooperation and international financing, something like a global Marshall Plan for renewable technology.

8. Dear Colleagues, we should consider seriously whether the technology agreement in Copenhagen should have a dispensation for renewable energy options. The goal of such a dispensation would be simultaneously to ramp up their deployment and diffusion in developing countries and to bring down their costs.

9. The second lesson we will take away from here is what President Nasheed called a Green Power Revolution, learning from the lessons of the Green Revolution in which India led the way, with international cooperation, in the 1960s and 1970s, to address what was then the most formidable threat faced by developing countries, the threat of famine and food insecurity. Several speakers alluded to the CGIAR network as a model for addressing the challenge of climate change as well as energy poverty. As you are aware, the Green Revolution relied on an elaborate mosaic of interlocking institutions for research, education, credit, marketing, inputs provision, and most importantly, extension-getting the knowledge into the hands of those who needed it. Within 10 years we had transferred knowledge from a few hundred scientists to millions of farmers, the vast majority of whom were illiterate. The CGIAR network provided international support and cooperation in research and education.

10. India has already proposed the idea of technology innovation centers, which build regional, national and local capacities, identify measures to overcome barriers to adoption and diffusion, and enable cross fertilization and sharing of ideas. As one delegate put it, however, these must be centers of excellence, for otherwise they have no meaning. A CGIAR type of global network could provide international support for research and cooperation and ensure that they become centers of excellence. In many areas, the technologies and solutions are well known; we need to find a way of getting them to people who can use them.

11. Dear Colleagues, we should also consider whether the technology decision in Copenhagen should have a dedicated plank on a CGIAR type system intended to promote the diffusion and deployment of climate friendly technologies.

12. Third, while there will continue to be a need for further consultation on the role of IPRs, I was happy to note that all delegations and experts in this meeting approached this question seriously. In the context of IPRs, we have to discuss some of the details of the ideal regime, and especially how to provide broader and more universal access to intellectual property and knowledge, how to democratize access to technologies that would determine whether or not we will successfully address the climate crisis while pursuing sustainable development and poverty eradication, how to make sure that IPRs do not become a barrier to the achievement of common global goals.

There is a broad agreement that governments must create the right kind of incentives, the necessary level of predictability and transparency, and the appropriate level of protection to stimulate creativity as well as learning, innovation as well as diffusion, growth as well as equity, in particular the access of developing countries to technology and knowledge at the most affordable cost. We heard many interesting recommendations on how these goals could be achieved, and I hope these discussions have brought us one step closer to a consensus in the climate negotiations. We have recognized that there are different views on the subject. Yet, this remains a central issue in our discussion. We need to evolve a common understanding on the issue and reflect the central concern in the statement.

13. Fourth, many of us urged for accelerated investment in research and development, including collaboration in research between advanced and developing countries, and support for capacity building in the latter countries.

14. Fifth, we also need to move towards specificity in the global mechanisms for technology development, deployment, and transfer. What I have said up to now is of the nature of a bottom up approach, and this needs to be combined with a top down approach. Here too, we have learned several lessons from your comments, and at two different levels. At the first level, there was a welcome set of references to practical experiences, to models that have worked in practice, to success stories. I have mentioned the reference to the Green Energy and CGIAR model, as well as the Marshall Plan. There were also references to the Montreal Protocol, the growth of the Internet, and others.

15. Beyond this, we heard several specific proposals for such a global mechanism. Our distinguished colleague from Poland was the most eloquent, in the context of Poland's generous commitment to provide its share of global financial and other resources, to challenge us to ensure that we work out a burden sharing formula based on emissions as well as ability to pay, so that this formula can continue to be used transparently and predictably in the future.

16. Finally, there was a wide recognition of the need for a special mechanism under the UNFCCC for technology transfer, development, and deployment, supported by a special fund, with periodic assessment of performance, and a mechanism to oversee the functioning of the IPR regime for climate and development goals. This could take the form of a specific subsidiary body on technology of the Conference of Parties under the UNFCCC. This subsidiary body could have specific dedicated programs, including the two I mentioned earlier, namely one on renewable energy, and another on a CGIAR-type model. Such a platform could support and receive support from the CGIAR type system described earlier. For instance, and this is another concrete proposal, that the special mechanism should include a technology assessment panel, a verification panel, and a strategic planning council.

17. In the end, we would like to thank all the country party delegations and representatives of various stakeholders, like academia, trade and industry, and civil society, from India and abroad for their extremely valuable contributions without which this conference would not have been successful. We hope that discussions will prove to be an important input to the forthcoming negotiations at Barcelona and Copenhagen and help us in reaching an agreed outcome.

103. Delhi Statement on Global Cooperation on Climate Technology.

New Delhi, October 23, 2009.

1. We, Ministers and Government Representatives, having met at the Delhi High-Level Conference on Climate Change Technology Development and Transfer, recall the Beijing High-Level Technology Development and Technology Transfer held in November 2008, reaffirm our commitment to the objective, provisions and principles of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, to the Bali Road Map and to the Bali Action Plan, which seeks to enhance implementation of the Convention, culminating at Copenhagen in December 2009, and state the following:

Climate Change

2. Climate change is one of the most pressing global challenges facing the international community requiring global cooperation on an unprecedented scale.

Technology for addressing climate change

3. Technology has a central and fundamental role in addressing climate change and promoting sustainable development. We believe that there is an urgent need to accelerate the large scale global deployment of environmentally-sound and climate-friendly technologies and to minimize the time lag between their initial development, transfer and deployment particularly in the developing countries. This will be promoted by sustained and enhanced international cooperation as well as appropriate national action.

Global Cooperation Mechanism

4. Enhanced cooperation worldwide is essential at all stages of the technology cycle. Existing mechanisms, as well as any new and innovative mechanisms in the public and public-private domains for global cooperation, should enhance adaptation and deployment of environmentally sound and climate-friendly technologies, and the joint research and development of new technologies and products which are at a nascent stage of development. Capacity building, training, public awareness and education are key to the successful uptake of technologies for adaptation and mitigation.

Lessons from Successful International Partnership

5. Any future international cooperative mechanisms for technology cooperation, development, transfer and dissemination may draw lessons from the experiences of successful examples of partnerships.

Technology Network

6. Concepts such as a centre, or networks of centres, to support and stimulate rapid development and deployment of innovative technologies for climate mitigation and adaptation should be explored. Such a centre, or network of centres, should also promote close collaboration between governments, industries and research communities of developed and developing countries.

Technology Assessment

7. We believe that the wide diversity of available technologies and the conditions of their applicability indicate a need for periodic assessment, evaluation and expert guidance on new and emerging technologies.

Technologies for Adaptations

8. There is a critical need to improve the identification of, access to, and deployment of technologies for adaptation, especially to developing countries that are most vulnerable to the adverse impacts of climate change. Research, development and deployment of technologies for adaptation, including of indigenous technologies, would be enhanced by international cooperative actions.

Technology Financing

9. We recognise also the roles of both public and private financing to enable the accelerated large-scale development, transfer and deployment of technologies for adaptation and mitigation. Public financing, in particular, could catalyse and enhance activities such as capacity building, needs assessments, and the more rapid deployment and adoption of technologies for mitigation and adaptation, especially in those developing countries that are most vulnerable to the impacts of climate change. The importance of mobilising private sector financing should also be noted.

International Conferences/Congresses

10. We recognize that countries face uncertainties about appropriate technological choices, and that good decision-making requires regular provision of high quality information that can come from multiple sources. We support regular conferences/congresses for such purposes. We also appreciate the offer of the Government of India to host such conferences/congresses along with UN-DESA.

Technology in the Copenhagen Outcome

11. We strongly urge the Conference of Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, at their fifteenth session at Copenhagen, to take into consideration the elements of this statement.

Contribution by Stakeholders

12. We welcome the participation of, and the contribution made, at this Conference, by governments, civil society, the private sector, academia and other experts, and emphasize the importance of their continued role in promoting climate-related technology development and cooperation.

13. We express our deep appreciation to the Government of India for the organization of this Conference, and for their hospitality. We also appreciate the United Nations - Department of Economic and Social Affairs (UN-DESA) for their role in helping to organize this Conference.

104. Extracts from Introductory Remarks by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Meeting of Prime Minister's Council on Climate Change on the National Mission on Sustaining the Himalayan Eco-system.

New Delhi, October 26, 2009.

Let me thank you for being present for a very important meeting of this Council, since we are considering a long-term policy framework to deal with one of the most serious ecological challenges facing our country, in fact, facing the entire subcontinent. To my mind, the National Mission for Sustaining the Himalayan Eco-System is one of the most critical of the various Missions under the National Action Plan on Climate Change. It impacts directly on Water Security as well as Food Security and, therefore, involves the livelihood of hundreds of millions of our people. We all know that the entire Himalayan zone, including the high mountains, the foothills and the terai area, constitute an extremely fragile ecological zone. Over the years, there has been steady degradation of this sensitive zone as a result of deforestation, demographic pressures, rapid and often uncontrolled urbanization and road building and construction with only marginal attention being paid to environmental safeguards. Now, however, these stresses and strains are already beginning to be accentuated by the adverse consequences of Climate Change. While the larger challenge of global Climate Change has to be addressed, we need to prepare our country and people to anticipate and respond to its consequences. And part of the adaptation response lies in halting and reversing the ecological degradation that has already taken place in the Himalayas.

I am happy to see that the Mission document has come out with a long-term plan to carefully and comprehensively monitor all the key indicators of climate change phenomena in the Himalayan zone. We have anecdotal evidence that glaciers may be receding, but we need precise and carefully vetted data, both through satellite imaging and ground surveys. The establishment of a Centre for Glaciological Studies is welcome. I would also like to compliment the Minister of Environment and Forests, for the initiative he has taken to commission a study on Himalayan glaciers in collaboration with ISRO. This initiative must become an integral part of this National Mission and must be institutionalized so that the longer-term trends are monitored and analysed. Only then would it be possible to formulate appropriate and effective adaptation strategies.

I am happy that the National Mission has a section devoted to socio-economic challenges with a set of concrete immediate and long term measures to deal with them. The involvement of local communities is indispensable in ensuring the successful implementation of this Mission. The reference to drawing upon local and traditional knowledge and practices is laudable. We must find ways to institutionalize this. It is extremely important that we lose no time in implementing the practical measures that have been identified. While the State Governments have been sensitized to the need for such measures, I will invite the Chief Ministers of the Himalayan States to join in a national effort to safeguard the Himalayan eco-system. My intention is to institutionalize this interaction by making it an annual feature.

While a large part of the Himalayan range lies within Indian territory, there are other countries who share the mountain ranges with us. These include Nepal, Bhutan, China and Pakistan. Any comprehensive Climate Change Action Plan for the entire Himalayan zone will, of course, require coordinated action among all stakeholder countries. Some bilateral initiatives are being taken, for example, with China and with Bhutan. But we have to recognize the need for much greater engagement and coordination with all our neighbours which share the Himalayas.

105. Statement by the Prime Minister's Special Envoy on Climate Change Shyam Saran at the Closing Plenary Session of AWG - LCA of UNFCCC Climate Change Meeting.

Barcelona (Spain), November 6, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

We associate ourselves with the position of G-77 and China.

I would like to express our sincere appreciation for the significant contribution you have made to our work in the AWG- LCA. We know that you have a difficult task as the skipper of our ship and more turbulent waters lie ahead of us. We count on your navigating skills to see us safely on shore. Our appreciation also goes to the Government of Spain, Government of Cataluna and the beautiful, historic city of Barcelona for outstanding hospitality extended to us.

2. Mr. Chairman, we categorically reject attempts that are being made to already declare failure at Barcelona and downgrade our expectations from Copenhagen. To talk about a political agreement instead of a legally binding outcome, to suggest that we may be able to achieve some result only by the end of 2010, these are prophecies which we must dismiss. The clock has not stopped ticking at Barcelona, although I did hear alarm go off at mid day today. This reminds us that when we resume work at Copenhagen, we must utilize the time available to us before the HLS commences, to deliver on the mandate to which we have all signed onto by consensus in the Bali Action Plan. In other consultative fora, it will be our effort to reinforce the prospects of success in the multilateral negotiations under the UNFCCC.

3. I wish to emphasize that India is not prepared to give up at this stage. I am confident that neither is the vast majority of Parties represented here. We intend to keep faith with our people, and with humanity at large, particularly with the youth and spare no effort to deliver on an international legally binding outcome that is equal to meeting the urgent and compelling challenge of global climate change. We will retain the audacity to hope.

4. Therefore, while we are disappointed by the lack of progress in our deliberations, this only reinforces on our determination to work even harder at Copenhagen to achieve what we set out to do - a comprehensive, balanced and above all an equitable outcome.

5. Mr. Chairman, if those who have promised to take the lead, wish instead to fall behind, we, for our part, as developing country will not slacken our effort. In many ways, developing countries are already doing much more on climate change than our developed country partners. We are doing so despite the severe limitation of our modest resources. And more important we are taking these significant activities, despite there being no legal obligation on our part to do so. Without making these conditional upon what others are prepared to do, something we see as a constant refrain in the debate on developed country targets. We are going round in circles. " I will show you my targets, when you show me yours."

6. In Barcelona, the various contact groups have further advanced their work, narrowed difference and identified areas where convergence is possible. This is valuable work and sets the stage for us to continue to aim for a substantive outcome at Copenhagen. The key component, of course remains the willingness of the Annex-I parties to come up with significant emission reduction targets, both for the medium term and the long term. Kyoto Protocol parties must do so as part of their legal obligations. They need to commit to specific, legally binding targets for the second commitment period commencing 2013. Those who are not parties to the Kyoto Protocol, must commit themselves to comparable commitments, as they are obliged to do under Bali Action Plan. This order cannot be reversed, i.e., it is not that Kyoto Protocol Parties have the option to reduce the level of commitments to that which may be set by non- Kyoto Protocol Parties. Rather non- Kyoto Protocol Parties must come up with targets which are comparable to what Annex-I parties are legally obliged to commit to, under the protocol. The BAP is quite clear on this.

7. I wish to conclude with another important concern of my delegation. Whatever outcome is possible at Copenhagen, we must ensure that post-Copenhagen, UNFCCC continue to remain the foundation of our climate change action. The BAP equally will continue to provide the mandate of our subsequent work. We must guard against a weak, declaratory outcome, which then become the template for our future work that would be a setback.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

106. Statement by Prime Minister's Special Envoy on Climate Change Shyam Saran at Press Conference.

Barcelona (Spain), November 6, 2009.

Dear Friends from the Media,

Today is our final day at Barcelona and we are in the process, as delegations from our respective countries, of taking stock of where we are and how we take the negotiating process forward at Copenhagen, barely a month away from now. I am aware that both civil society groups and international media have been following our work very closely and I can also appreciate the sense of disappointment and even anxiety over the apparent lack of progress in our deliberations. However, we must all recognise that these negotiations are complex and difficult, and we as India, are not prepared to give up too early and already settle for a weak and merely declaratory outcome. We will continue to exert all our efforts towards what the Bali Action Plan has mandated us to do i.e. aim for a comprehensive, balanced and above all, an equitable outcome at Copenhagen, which has a level of ambition in consonance with the urgent and compelling nature of the global challenge of climate change.

Let me give you a sense of the process as it will unfold on the road to Copenhagen. I understand that there will be a report from the Chairman of the Ad-Hoc Working Group on Long Term Cooperative Action, which will put together the various non- papers on specific elements of the Bali Action Plan, as they would have culminated at the end of the day. This, along with the compilation of submissions made by parties, which is our guiding document, will go to Copenhagen, where negotiations will continue in the first week and beyond until the High Level Segment meets. A similar report will also emanate from the parallel negotiating track i.e. Ad- Hoc Working Group on Kyoto Protocol.

In Barcelona, the various contact groups have further advanced their work, narrowed differences wherever possible and identified areas where convergence appears achievable. This is valuable work and sets the stage for us to continue to aim for a substantive outcome at Copenhagen. The key component, of course, remains the willingness of Annex I parties to come up with significant emission reduction targets, both for the medium term and the long term. Kyoto Protocol parties must do so as part of their legal obligation. They need to commit to specific, legally binding targets for the second commitment period commencing 2013. Those who are not parties to the Kyoto Protocol, must commit themselves to comparable commitments, as they are obliged to do under Bali Action Plan. This order cannot be reversed i.e. it is not that Kyoto Protocol Parties should reduce their level of commitments to that which may be determined by non-Annex parties. The Bali Action Plan is quite clear on this.

Whatever outcome is possible at Copenhagen, we must ensure that post-Copenhagen, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change continue to remain the foundation of our climate change action. The Bali Action Plan equally must continue to form the mandate of our continuing work. We must guard against a weak, declaratory outcome, which then becomes the template for our future work.

Questions are raised about what countries like India are prepared to. We have announced an ambitious National Action Plan on Climate Change with 8 National Missions. Unlike actions being pledged by several developed countries, we have not made our national actions conditional upon international support. We will do what we can within the limits of our resources. But it is reasonable for us to say that we can do more, if global support was available in the form of financial and technological resources.

107. Intervention by Minister of Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh at the Pre-COP meeting.

Copenhagen, November 16, 2009.

1. India is prepared to reflect in any agreement its commitment to keep its per capita emissions below that of the developed countries. India's per capita approach has drawn wide support including from two Nobel Laureates (Schelling and Spence) and from the German Council for Climate Change, an influential think tank. India's per capita emissions are now around 1.2 tonnes of CO<sub>2</sub> equivalent and are expected to be around 2 to 2.5 tonnes by 2020 and 3 to 3.5 tonnes by 2030. The per capita limit is an onerous limit that India has imposed on itself.

2. India has several nationally appropriate mitigation actions (NAMAs) which it is considering to convert to nationally accountable mitigation outcomes (NAMOs) by indicating specific performance targets in industry, energy, transport, agriculture, buildings and forestry for the year 2020 and 2030. These NAMOs could be institutionalised through either legislative or executive action and are derived from the National Action Plan on Climate Change and the 11th Five Year Plan document.

3. India is prepared to submit a National Communication once every two years to the UNFCCC covering both supported and unsupported actions and their outcomes as well as their impacts on emissions. This National Communication could be used as a basis for international consultations with the UNFCCC.

This will more than meet the demand for international reflection of domestic commitments and obligations taken on unilaterally. The format of reporting could be decided by the UNFCCC after discussions and consensus among Parties.

4. India will make low carbon sustainable growth a central element of its 12th Plan growth strategy. This will mean taking on commitments to reduce energy to GDP intensity and corresponding emission reduction outcomes for the year 2020.

On November 19 Mr. Ramesh while releasing the "State of World Population 2009" report said in New Delhi "We need to distinguish international commitments from our domestic obligations. Our position in international fora will strengthen if we are seen to be serious with our domestic obligations." He however added that domestically India would have to be relentless and ruthless in moving on a low-carbon trajectory to minimise the effects of climate change on the country. He did not agree with the proposition that increase in green house gas emissions was linked to population increase. Quoting the example of China he said despite a negative population growth rate between 1985 and 2005, emissions in China went up by 43 per cent. "It's not so much a population issue but one of lifestyle and consumption patterns," he said.

Ladies and Gentlemen: The negotiations heading toward Copenhagen are proving more difficult than we would have liked. There is disagreement among industrialized countries and between industrialized and developing countries. It is important for all countries to make every effort to contribute to a successful outcome at Copenhagen. India was a latecomer to industrialization and as such we have contributed very little to the accumulation of greenhouse gas emissions that cause global warming. But, we are determined to be part of the solution to the problem. We are willing to work towards any solution that does not compromise the right of developing countries to develop and lift their populations out of poverty. We recognize that we have to act on climate change in our own interest, since we are among the countries most impacted by climate change. It is for this reason that we have adopted an ambitious National Action Plan on Climate Change. We are committed to ambitious and time-bound outcomes that will increase the energy efficiency of our economy, the share of clean energy including nuclear power in our energy mix, and our forest cover. All this will require considerable resources. We have undertaken to do what we can with our own resources. We will do more if there is global support in terms of financial resources and technology transfer.

ENSURING SUSTAINABLE GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT AND A CLEAN ENERGY FUTURE

Recognizing that energy security, food security, climate change are interlinked, and that eliminating poverty and ensuring sustainable development and a clean energy future are among the foremost global objectives, the two leaders agreed to enter into a Green Partnership to address these global challenges.

They two Leaders reaffirmed their intention to promote the full, effective and sustained implementation of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) in accordance with the Bali Action Plan. Recognizing their special role in promoting a successful and substantive outcome at the UNFCCC 15th Conference of Parties at Copenhagen in December, 2009, they reaffirmed their intention to work together bilaterally and with all other countries for an agreed outcome at that meeting.

The two leaders also affirmed that the Copenhagen outcome must be comprehensive and cover mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology, and in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, it should reflect emission reduction targets of developed countries and nationally appropriate mitigation actions of developing countries. There should be full transparency through appropriate processes as to the implementation of aforesaid mitigation actions. The outcome should further reflect the need for substantially scaled-up financial resources to support mitigation and adaptation in developing countries, in particular, for the poorest and most vulnerable. It should also include measures for promoting technology development, dissemination and transfer and capacity building, including consideration of a center or a network of centers to support and stimulate climate innovation. India and the United States, consistent with their national circumstances, resolved to take significant national mitigation actions that will strengthen the world's ability to combat climate change. They resolved to stand by these commitments.

Recognizing the need to create the clean energy economy of the 21st century, Prime Minister Singh and President Obama agreed to launch a Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative. The goal of the Initiative would be to improve the lives of the people of both countries by developing and improving access to technologies that make our energy cleaner, affordable and more efficient. The Initiative will include cooperation in wind and solar energy, second generation bio-fuels, unconventional gas, energy efficiency, and clean coal technologies including carbon capture and storage. The success of this Initiative is expected to enhance the ability of India and the United States to provide new economic opportunities for their people and create new clean energy jobs.

111. Intervention by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh on Climate Change at CHOGM.

Port of Spain, November 27, 2009.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me express my deep appreciation to your Excellency and the Government and people of Trinidad and Tobago for the wonderful hospitality and warm friendship extended to my delegation and to me personally since our arrival in your beautiful island country. Excellency, you are hosting the Commonwealth Summit at a very critical juncture, in particular, as regards the challenge of global climate change. We are only days away from the convening of the 15th Conference of Parties to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change in Copenhagen. Our special session this afternoon, devoted to Climate Change, is therefore, particularly opportune. It enables us to send a powerful political message to Copenhagen so as to ensure an ambitious, substantive and equitable outcome.

I welcome the participation of His Excellency, the Prime Minister of Denmark. His perspective on the multilateral negotiations is particularly useful. I wish to assure him that my delegation will play a constructive and positive role and support all his efforts to secure a successful outcome.

President Sarkozy's presence at our deliberations adds to their quality. We have benefited from his insights and his wisdom and, in particular, his concern over the challenges posed to developing countries by Climate Change.

His Excellency, the Secretary-General of the United Nations has played a key role in raising awareness of the dangers posed by Climate Change to humanity and has repeatedly stressed the need for urgency in our actions. We agree with his assessment that the time for action is now.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to express India's complete solidarity with the sentiments expressed by several leaders from Small Island Developing States and our brothers from Africa. They are the least responsible for climate change and yet are the most vulnerable to its impact. Their very survival is at stake. We appreciate their concern because India, too, has extensive island territories and low lying coastal plains, which are vulnerable to sea-level rise and extreme climatic events. We have modest resources at our disposal but we are willing to share whatever we have to build adaptive capacity among the least developed countries and the Small Island Developing States.

Mr. Chairman, let me share with you and my colleagues assembled here India's perspective on the forthcoming Conference of Parties in Copenhagen.

The multilateral negotiations under the UNFCCC have been proceeding on two parallel tracks for the past two years. The first track derives its mandate from the Bali Action Plan adopted by consensus in December, 2007. Its mandate for the multilateral negotiations is very clear and unambiguous. We are to work towards an Agreed Outcome at Copenhagen which would represent enhanced implementation of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. The Bali Action Plan calls for enhanced implementation specifically in respect of mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology. And why was it necessary to enhance implementation in these respects? Precisely because the provisions of the UNFCCC had barely been implemented and in the meantime, the threat of Climate Change had become more compelling than had been envisaged when the Rio Convention was concluded in 1992. Therefore, if the outcome at Copenhagen diminishes rather than enhances the implementation of the UNFCCC in respect of the specific components of mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology, it would represent a serious setback, no matter how we seek to characterize this result.

A view has been expressed that given the limited amount of time available, we should aim for a political outcome rather than a legally binding outcome. Our view is that we should not pre-empt the Copenhagen negotiating process. Whatever time is still available to us before the High Level Segment meets from December 16, should be used to achieve as much convergence as possible. If the consensus is that only a political document is feasible then we must make certain that the post-Copenhagen process continues to work on the Bali mandate and the UNFCCC continues to be the international template for global climate action. We must avoid any lowering of sights.

Mr. Chairman, India has repeatedly emphasized the need for the Copenhagen outcome to be comprehensive, balanced and above all, equitable. It must be comprehensive in the sense that it must cover all the inter-related components of mitigation, adaptation, finance and technology. This means we should resist a partial outcome. Furthermore, there must be balance and equal priority given to each of the 4 components. Mitigation is important but cannot take precedence over adaptation which, for many countries represented here, poses a greater challenge. And most important from our perspective, is the need to ensure an equitable outcome corresponding to the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. India is willing to sign on to an ambitious global target for emissions reductions or limiting temperature increase but this must be accompanied by an equitable burden sharing paradigm. We acknowledge the imperative of science but science must not trump equity. Climate Change action based on the perpetuation of poverty will simply not be sustainable.

I would like to emphasise that Climate Change is a challenge of global dimensions. It deserves a global and a collaborative response. It is unfortunate that the global discourse on Climate Change has become enmeshed with arguments about maintaining economic competitiveness or level playing fields. Climate Change is becoming the pretext for pursuing protectionist policies under a green label. This would be contrary to the UNFCCC and a violation of the WTO as well. India and other developing countries will strongly resist this.

Before I conclude, I wish to say a few words about the second track in the multilateral negotiations, which is the Kyoto Protocol track. Contrary to impressions which have been mistakenly circulated, the Kyoto Protocol will not expire in 2012. 2012 marks the end of the first commitment period for developed country parties to fulfill their legally binding obligations to reduce their economy-wide emissions by a specific quantified figure. The negotiations under way are to review progress achieved in meeting the targets by 2012 and to sign on to more significant obligations in the second commitment period commencing in 2013. Despite the efforts of the developing country parties to the Protocol, no progress has been achieved in fulfilling the mandate of the Working Group on Kyoto Protocol, which has been meeting for the past three years. The attempts by some countries to dispense with the Kyoto Protocol altogether has generated avoidable misgivings and has been strongly resisted by all developing countries without exception. We hope that a legally valid instrument to which we too are parties, will not be set aside in a cavalier manner. This will undermine credibility in any future legally binding instrument.

Mr. Chairman, India has adopted an ambitious National Action Plan on Climate Change with 8 National Mission covering both mitigation and adaptation. We have not made their implementation conditional upon obtaining international support. However, we can certainly do more if there is a supportive global regime. Each of the National Missions, including those on renewable energy, enhancing energy efficiency and expanding forest cover, are platforms on which we would be happy to pursue cooperative partnership with sister Commonwealth countries.

We welcome the proposal made by Prime Minister Gordon Brown for the mobilization of at least $ 100 billion by 2020 for supporting climate change action in developing countries. We also welcome the priority he has given to the needs of Least Developed Countries and Small Island Developing States. However, much of this finance is market-based and hence subject to market volatility and unpredictability. We can hardly plan long-term action on this basis. Furthermore, adaptation requirements do not lend themselves to market based finance*.

I thank you for your attention

* The Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs told the media in Port of Spain after the Prime Minister's separate meetings with the British Prime Minister Gordon Brown and the special invitee the French President Sarkozy that India had a major stake in the Copenhagen meet and would like to see a "balanced, ambitious and equitable outcome" from it. Dr. Singh emphasised on transfer of adequate resources and technology to developing nations, which was the "key" to the fight against climate change, the Spokesperson reportedly said. While noting that India was one of the worst affected by climate change, Dr. Singh apprised Mr. Sarkozy and Mr. Brown of the unilateral steps taken by his government to tackle the problem through the National Action Plan, he said.

(India is pressing for a "legally-binding substantive" outcome at the Copenhagen meet, disapproving the attempt by the United States and some other developed countries to defer a cut in greenhouse gas emission.)

Separately the Special Envoy of Prime Minister on Climate Change Shyam Saran told a TV channel on November 29, in the Port of Spain that there was no question of taking any binding carbon emission cuts, indicating the coordinated approach major emerging economies including Beijing and New Delhi were likely to adopt at the climate change summit in Copenhagen. "There cannot be any emission cuts... that is what we have said and also something the developed countries have said... they [industrialised nations] don't expect countries like India to actually sign on the emission reduction target, but rather to sign to a deviation from business as usual," he added. He maintained that, "it is a question how this [mitigation steps] has to be reflected at Copenhagen. And what we have stated is that we are in a position to reflect whatever we are doing in the form of our national communication to the U.N. Framework on Climate Change [UNFCCC]." Pointing to China's voluntary offer he said "China has essentially not announced an emission reduction target, but has announced a slowing down of its emission growth". "It is reducing the energy intensity and then the carbon intensity of its future growth, which means its [rate of] emissions will grow slower than they would normally have," he explained and added: "That [what China is doing] is not very different from what India has been saying, that even though its energy efficiency is already quite impressive, it is in position to continue with this improvement in its energy efficiencies and probably reach a figure of about 25 per cent by 2020."

He pointed out that, "the country delivered 8 to 9 per cent growth in the last 10 years or more with 3.8 or 3.9 per cent growth in energy per annum, which means, the energy intensity growth is coming down and this trend is expected to continue."

112. Declaration on Climate Change issued by the Heads of Government of the Commonwealth countries at their Summit meeting.

Port of Spain, November 28, 2009.

The Challenge of Our Time

1. Climate change is the predominant global challenge. We convened a Special Session on Climate Change in Port of Spain to discuss our profound concern about the undisputed threat that climate change poses to the security, prosperity, economic and social development of our people. For many it is deepening poverty and affecting the attainment of the Millennium Development Goals. For some of us, it is an existential threat.
2. We reaffirm our commitment to the Lake Victoria Commonwealth Climate Change Action Plan and its further implementation, in particular by contributing to the efforts of member states in transforming their economies and strengthening the capacity and voice of vulnerable groups.
3. We recognise the unprecedented opportunity of our meeting just ahead of the 15th Conference of the Parties to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change in Copenhagen. We approach Copenhagen with ambition, optimism and determination. We welcome the attendance of leaders at the Copenhagen conference. The needs of the most vulnerable must be addressed. Their voice must be heard and capacity to engage strengthened. Many of us from small island states, low-lying coastal states and least developed countries face the greatest challenges, yet have contributed least to the problem of climate change.
4. In keeping with the spirit of the theme of CHOGM 2009, 'Partnering for a more equitable and sustainable future', we warmly welcomed the United Nations Secretary General, the Prime Minister of Denmark and the President of France.
5. We represent a third of the world's population in all continents and oceans, and more than one quarter of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. We have the global reach and diversity to help forge the inclusive global solutions needed to combat climate change.
6. Science, and our own experience, tells us that we only have a few short years to address this threat. The average global temperature has risen because of the increase in carbon and other greenhouse gas emissions. The latest scientific evidence indicates that in order to avoid dangerous climate change that is likely to have catastrophic impacts we must find solutions using all available avenues. We must act now.

7. We believe an internationally legally binding agreement is essential. We pledge our continued support to the leaders-driven process guided by the Danish Prime Minister and his efforts to deliver a comprehensive, substantial and operationally binding agreement in Copenhagen leading towards a full legally binding outcome no later than 2010. In Copenhagen we commit to focus our efforts on achieving the strongest possible outcome.

Copenhagen and Beyond

8. A global climate change solution is central to the survival of peoples, the promotion of development and facilitation of a global transition to a low emission development path. The agreement in Copenhagen must address the urgent needs of developing countries by providing financing, support for adaptation, technology transfer, capacity building, approaches and incentives for reducing emissions from deforestation and forest degradation, and for afforestation and sustainable management of forests.

9. In addition, we will strive to significantly increase technological and technology support to developing countries to facilitate the deployment and diffusion of clean technologies through a range of mechanisms. We will work to facilitate and enable the transition to low-emission economies, climate resilience, and in particular, support, including through capacity building, for increasing the climate resilience of vulnerable economies. We will also aim to develop cleaner, more affordable and renewable energy sources. We must explore global mechanisms through which those identified technologies can be disseminated as rapidly as possible.

10. Ensuring the viability of states should underpin a shared vision for long-term cooperative action and a long-term global goal for emission reductions. In building towards an international agreement, all countries will need to play their part, in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

11. We need an ambitious mitigation outcome at Copenhagen to reduce the risks of dangerous climate change without compromising the legitimate development aspirations of developing countries. We stress our common conviction that urgent and substantial action to reduce global emissions is needed and have a range of views as to whether average global temperature increase should be constrained to below 1.5 degrees or to no more than 2 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels. We also recognise the need for an early peaking year for global emissions. Developed countries should continue to lead on cutting their emissions, and developing countries, in line with their national circumstances, should also take action to achieve a substantial deviation from business-as-usual emissions including with financial and technical support, and also supported by technology and capacity building.

12. Progress towards predictable and adequate finance for adaptation and mitigation measures must be achieved in any new multilateral approach. Public and private financial resources for developing countries will need to be scaled up urgently and substantially by 2020. We recognise that adaptation finance in particular should be targeted towards the poorest and most vulnerable countries. The provision of finance should be additional to existing official development assistance commitments. In this respect, we acknowledge the potential role of the private sector and carbon markets.

13. In addition, we recognise the need for an early start to the provision for financial resources. Fast start funding, constituting grant funding, should provide substantial support for adaptation, REDD plus<sup>1</sup> and clean technology. We welcomed the initiative to establish, as part of a comprehensive agreement, a Copenhagen Launch Fund starting in 2010 and building to a level of resources of $10 billion annually by 2012. Fast start funding for adaptation should be focused on the most vulnerable countries. We also welcomed a proposal to provide immediate, fast disbursing assistance with a dedicated stream for small island states, and associated low-lying coastal states of AOSIS<sup>2</sup> of at least 10% of the fund. We also recognise the need for further, specified and comparable funding streams, to assist the poorest and most vulnerable countries, to cope with, and adapt to the adverse impacts of climate change. We recognise that funding will be scaled up beyond 2012.

14. We agree that an equitable governance structure to manage the financial and technological support must be put in place. We agree that a future governance structure should provide for states to monitor and comply with arrangements entered under a new Copenhagen agreement.

113. Information given in the Lok Sabha by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on Emission Reduction Mechanism.

New Delhi, December 2, 2009.

India has consistently argued that developing countries have no emission reduction obligations and they will take nationally appropriate mitigation actions on voluntary basis as supported and enabled by finance and technology provided by developed countries. Voluntary actions of developing countries will be subject to international monitoring, report and verification (MRV) as per agreed procedures to the extent that these actions receive international support

India's position on Climate Change negotiations is anchored in the principle of equity and "common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities" of Parties as enshrined in the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and its Kyoto Protocol. India and other developing countries have also consistently stated that the developed countries must fulfill their commitments under the Convention to provide resources to developing countries to enable them to undertake actions for adaptation to and mitigation of climate change. Negotiations on these issues are underway and the Parties are expected to reach an agreed outcome on the negotiations in Copenhagen in December 2009.

114. Interview of Minister of State for Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh with the daily Indian Express.

New Delhi, December 2, 2009.

Question: Is the government working on declaring some targets on climate change apart from what we have heard on the National Action Plan on Climate Change?

Answer: The Prime Minister has said that we shouldn't get isolated, but we should also keep our national interests in mind. The Chinese declaration on carbon intensity is a wake-up call for us. The Ministry of Environment and Forests is talking to the Planning Commission and the Bureau of Energy Efficiency for setting some performance targets. We are looking at energy efficiency, carbon intensity, domestic performance target for sectors like transport and industry. We are working on getting numbers and targets together before December 18. Without taking any emission cuts, we are looking at targets that we can make public.

Q: China has declared its targets for carbon intensity - bringing down levels of carbon in relation to per unit of GDP by 40 per cent by 2020. Is this is a good model for India to follow?

A: The Chinese have taken a leadership position. At the same time, our emissions are very low when compared to China. Perhaps what China will achieve in 2020 after all the carbon intensity target is what India was emitting in 2005. Expectations from India should be low as our emissions are low. But the carbon intensity model is a good one and we should definitely consider it as an option.

Q: After your meeting with Brazil, South Africa, China (BASIC countries), is there a consensus on the stand? What does the negotiating draft say?

A: Yes. The draft of the Copenhagen agreement was prepared in China. I went through the draft and we have agreed on the final draft after some changes. This is what the BASIC countries hope will be the outcome of Copenhagen. The draft contains long term-vision, action on mitigation of climate change and adaptation to climate change. In the draft there is no peaking year for emissions for the developing countries. India has made it clear that it will not take any legally binding emission cuts for climate change. India has rejected the Danish proposal which advocates 2025 as a peaking year for emissions for developing countries after which carbon emissions are expected to decline.

Q: The BASIC countries, especially China, have very different emission levels from India. Does it not harm India's interests to ally with them?

A: This is just the beginning. We don't know if the BASIC countries will stick together.

Q: We still don't have a definition of 'forests' in India. How does this affect our proposal for fiscal incentives for planting and preserving forests?

A: We will define forests when we have to cross that bridge. India has put forward the Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation proposal to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. If it is approved, foreign money will come in to protect our forests. Then the definition and perception of forests will have to change. India has said that it is willing to open any project which is funded internationally for international scrutiny.

115. Speech of the Minister of State for Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh while replying to the Short Duration Discussion in the Lok Sabha on climate change.

New Delhi, December 3, 2009.

Mr. Chairman Sir. It has been a four-hour short duration discussion. I would not have minded had it been of longer duration. I am prepared to sit here as long as the House wants and I am prepared to stand here on any day to explain the Government's stand on climate change. We have had 18 speakers today on this subject. The opening batsman was a very distinguished physicist himself and one of the tail-enders was a very distinguished mathematician. A Ph.D started the discussion and a Ph.D almost ended the discussion today. I am referring to Dr. Raghuvansh Prasad Singh who is a Ph.D. in Mathematics. We have had some excellent interventions. I want to mention specially that today the younger Members have been truly outstanding. By Indian political standards, even I am considered young, but I am not young. But I think, Shri Sandeep Dikshit, Shri Jayant Chaudhary, Shrimati Supriya Sule, and last but not least, Dr. Jyoti Mirdha made truly outstanding presentations and I want to compliment them for this. Permit me to deal with many of the important issues that have been raised today. There are policy issues that have been raised and each individual Member has raised some specific issues. Today, I will deal with the larger issues of policy. I would like to seek the indulgence of the House to respond to the specific issues of each individual Member separately with the Member concerned, like the Loharinag Pala issue of Dr. Jyoti Mirdha, and the forestry issue of my good friend, Shri Anant Kumar Hegde. My colleague from West Bengal, including Shri Panda, raised the issue of Sundarbans. So, on specific issues, if I may be permitted I will respond to each individual separately in writing.

I want to spend this evening discussing some of the larger issues of policy that have been raised. I want to begin by saying that today I found remarkable degree of agreement that climate change is a serious issue. This is very important. You yourself are from Orissa. Your colleague from Orissa has also spoken. Members from Uttar Pradesh and Members from West Bengal have spoken. Cutting across party lines, cutting across States, there was a clear message today that climate change is a very serious issue. On November 24th there was a Calling Attention Motion in the Rajya Sabha. In the Rajya Sabha, the issue was me. I am glad that in the Lok Sabha the issue is climate change, although some Members have made some reference to me and I will respond to them to the best of my ability. So, climate change is a very serious issue for India. Forget Copenhagen for the time being. Climate change is of great significance to our country. Ever since I became the Minister on 29th of May, I have been trying to spread this single message that the most vulnerable country in the world to climate change is India, not Maldives, not Bangladesh and not America, but India. There is no country that is as much impacted by climate change as India. Now, why do I say this?

First, we are dependent on monsoons, the south-west monsoon and the north-east monsoon. They are the lifeline of our country. Two out of every three Indians still depend on agriculture for their livelihood. What happens to the monsoon determines what happens to our economy and what happens to our general mood. We are depressed when the monsoons fail and we are happy when the monsoons are good. Monsoons are not only part of our economy but also part of our culture and part of our civilisation. Now, the uncertainty caused by climate change on the monsoon is of first and over-riding priority for India.

Secondly, Sir, we have the Himalayan Glaciers - anywhere between 9000 and 12000 Glaciers. There is a great deal of scientific debate on what is happening to these Glaciers but we do not have to wait for perfect science. The warning signals are already there. Most of the Glaciers are receding. Why are they receding? We cannot say it with hundred per cent certainty. Is it the natural process of cyclical change? Or, is it because of global warming? Scientists are still debating this issue. But what happens to the Himalayan Glaciers will determine the water security of our country. That is the second point of vulnerability.

Thirdly, we have vast critical ecological areas. My friend Shri Anant Kumar Hegde is not here. He also initiated the Short Duration Discussion. He comes from the Western Ghats. What happens to the Western Ghats will determine the future not only of Karnataka, Goa, Maharashtra and Kerala but indeed of the entire country. Take our North East. The North East has only four per cent of India's geographical area but 25 per cent of our forest cover is in the North-East. What happens? People have talked of Chirapunji. Chirapunji used to be the world's rainiest place. It no longer is. What happens to the Western Ghats? What happens to our North-East? What happens to the Andamans? What happens to Lakshadweep? This is the third area of vulnerability.

Fourthly, if you look at the map of India, if you see where the forests are located, if you see where the coal mines are, where the bauxite is, where the iron-ore is, it is in the same region. The more coal we produce, the more iron-ore we produce, the more bauxite we produce, the more forests we will have to give up. We know that giving up forests leads to more green house gas emissions.

There is no country in the world which has all these four dimensions of vulnerability. That is why, I have been saying time and again that India, of all the 192 countries in the world, owes a responsibility not to the world but to itself, to take climate change seriously. We are not doing the world a favour. Please forget Copenhagen; forget the UN. We have to do it in our own self-interest. Our future as a society is dependent on how we respond to the climate change challenge. Let me go to the second point. Today, the sad fact is that if you ask me what is going to be the impact of climate change on the Sunderbans, I cannot give you a good answer. I can only tell you Aila happened; Aila might happen. But I cannot give you a good answer. If you ask me what is going to be the impact of climate change on our monsoon, I can only say that there is uncertainty; monsoon in the North-West India might increase, monsoon in the North-East India might decrease. So, I cannot tell you. The reason for this is that so far, all the scientific studies on climate change have been done in the Western countries.

India has made no investment in studying the impact of climate change on India. This is a very important point. Today, all our knowledge on climate change is derived from the Western publications. It is derived from Western media, it is derived from Western political leaders and we have no independent source of information and data. This is a pathetic state of condition. A country like India, with its great scientific expertise, should have invested in climate change research 20 years ago.

Let me give you an example of what happened 20 years ago and Dr. Joshi will recall this example because he has been a distinguished Minister for Science and Technology. In 1990, the United States of America, a country with which I am allegedly very close to, issued a report saying that methane emissions from India's wet paddy cultivation was 38 million tonnes per year. This report caused international headlines. All the newspapers and the media went to town saying that Indian agriculture is contributing to global warming. There was one Indian scientist who disbelieved this figure. He is no more, a very distinguished physicist - Dr. Joshi knows him very well - Dr. A.P. Mitra, who was the Director of the National Physical Laboratory. I happened to work in the Prime Minister's Office at that time and Dr. Mitra came to me and said, I do not believe these numbers and I want to start my own experiment to generate my own data'. I went to the Finance Minister who happens to be our Prime Minister today and I said, Sir, we need to give this scientist and his team some money'. The money was sanctioned and a three-year project was started. At the end of three years, Dr. Mitra and his team conclusively established that methane emissions from Indian wet paddy cultivation was not 38 million tonnes per year, but between 2 and 6 million tonnes per year and today I must inform the hon. Members that the internationally accepted figure for methane emissions from Indian wet paddy cultivation is about 4 million tonnes per year, which is the median of 2 and 6. This is what we need to do.

There is a lot of sensationalism that is going on in the name of science. We must, on our own, understand what is going to happen to our own ecosystem on account of climate change. I would like to inform the hon. House that on the 14th of October this year, we launched, what is called, the Indian National Network on Comprehensive Climate Change Assessment and I will circulate a copy of this document to all the hon. Members. We have created a network of 97 research institutions in our country, 250 scientists have been brought together as a team and every year they will conduct and make public an assessment of what is happening on account of climate change. The first report will come in November of 2010 and this will be a report which will give an assessment by Indian scientists on what is going to happen because of climate change to the Sunderbans, to the Northeast, to the Western Ghats and to our agriculture. This is what India needs to have done 20 years ago. It did not do it for some reason. But I am not taking credit for it. I am only an instrument of policy. But what I want to say is, this is a very important step that we have taken. Forget Copenhagen; we must have our own scientific capacity to understand the impact of climate change.

We are a very varied country. We can have positive effect in one region and negative effect in another region. Rainfall might increase in Punjab and Haryana but rainfall could also decrease in Assam and Meghalaya. India is very varied. So we must understand the impact of climate change in India in all its eco-diversity. This is the second point I want to make because Members have raised this issue. One of the failures on my part amongst many other failures has been a failure to communicate to each individual Member of Parliament the full substance of what we have done. I thought that by putting it on our website, it becomes automatically public. I did not bargain for the reluctance of many of my colleagues to spend time on websites. I will now ensure that in the next couple of days all this literature and material will be available to you in hard copy in your residential addresses so that we can establish a constant process of communication. I have also decided that we will now place on the Table of the House many important documents that we release from time to time.

My young friend Jayant Chaudhary referred to forests. Just four days ago, we released the State of the Forest Report in India, 2009. This gives you the most comprehensive assessment of what is happening to forest cover in different States of the country. I have asked for the permission to lay this on the Table of the House. I hope that once such documentation becomes available, many of the questions that have been raised by Members of Parliament relating to the impact of climate change would get answered. This is my second submission.

Thirdly, let me talk a little bit about the Copenhagen process because that is the real issue that everybody wants to hear. All this is a sort of prelude; the real masala is Copenhagen. I entirely agree with my young friend Jayant Chaudhary, but my advice to him is: Do not be too bold at such a young age. It will create many problems for you. Go with the grain of conventional thinking before you become too much of an out-of-the-box thinker. Thinking out of the box in our country does not pay in the long run. You have to be in the box and occasionally get out of the box and come back into the box. On the international arena, when I took over as Minister for Environment and Forests on the 29th of May, the Prime Minister's instructions to me were: India has not caused the problem of global warming. But try and make sure that India is part of the solution. Be constructive; be proactive. That was all he told me. Then I asked myself what is India's position when it comes to international negotiations. The only position India had: Our per capita is very low; your per capita is very high; therefore we would not do anything. Sir, per capita is an accident of history. It so happened that we could not control our population. That is why, we get the benefit of per capita. When you divide anything by one billion, and that one billion is increasing by 12 million every year, it is no great credit for us. Our single biggest failure in the last 60 years has been our inability to control our population growth rate. Now the only position we have is: Do not touch us; our per capita is very low. It is an important point because per capita is the only instrument of ensuring equitable distribution. But it cannot be the only point. That is the point. So, when I first started looking at this international canvass, I was struck by the fact that India's position was: Our per capita is low and, therefore, we are entitled to pollute more till we reach your per capita levels. Since you have caused the problem, you must fix the problem. That was, broadly speaking, our position.

Sir, this is my personal belief, and you can question my judgment but do not question my motives. My personal belief is that India must negotiate from a position of strength; that India must negotiate from a position of leadership. I agree with Dr. Joshi that we must demonstrate an alternative model of growth; we must not follow the prosperity equal to pollution model of growth. I entirely agree with him. I may have political differences with him but on this I am entirely in agreement with him. It should not remain just a slogan; we have to take many important steps. So, I ask myself this question: Can we go beyond per capita? Per capita is the basic position. Our per capita is low. Our Prime Minister has said that our per capita emissions will never exceed per capita emissions of the developed world. I said that our per capita emissions will remain below that of the developed world. My friends from the Left Parties accused me of compromising the Prime Minister's statement. Sir, this is English language. This is semantics. I had a similar argument in the Rajya Sabha. ...

(Interruptions)

I have listened to you. Please listen to me, and then we can have another argument. I had a similar argument in the Rajya Sabha. To my simple mind, I do not see any difference between 'will not exceed' and 'will remain below'. It is the same thing. This is all, tearing hair on the English language. ... (Interruptions)

. ... (Interruptions) The curse is that, you know, we are experts in the English language. Therefore, that is the starting position of our negotiations. The hon. Members have asked: "on what basis are you going to Copenhagen?" The basic point is, per capita emissions will always remain below/never exceeds per capita emissions of the developed world. But, Sir, we have to offer something more to ourselves, not to the world. Let me now use this opportunity. A lot of Members of Parliament have asked me: What are the non-negotiables for India at Copenhagen. Sir, we are all patriotic. We all want to protect India's interests. I hope that much you will grant to me. I am not buying a ticket to Copenhagen to sell India's interest down the drain.

Sir, I have gone out of my way to ensure transparency in this whole process. I have written to all the Chief Ministers on the 1st of October, an eight-page letter on our stand on Copenhagen. I have written to 80 Members of Parliament. I should have written to all the 700 and odd Members of Parliament but I admittedly wrote to only 80 Members of Parliament on what our stand on climate change is. Sir, I wrote four months ago, to the hon. Speaker and to the hon. Chairman of the Rajya Sabha: Please nominate Members of Parliament as part of the official delegation to Copenhagen. Sir, you will be pleased to know today how jokingly, one of my colleagues, who is not here, said that I should take all those who speak today to Copenhagen. Unfortunately, Sir, I cannot do that. The hon. Speaker has nominated three MPs from the Lok Sabha; and the hon. Chairman of the Rajya Sabha has nominated two MPs from the Rajya Sabha. So, five MPs are going to be part of our official delegation to Copenhagen. Not only that, in 2030, 2040 and 2050, most of us will not be around, and we are discussing what is going to happen in years when most of us will not be around. That is why, for the first time as part of our official delegation, I am taking two school children and two college going students. We had an essay contest and an essay competition. Call it the new gender empowerment, all the prizes were won by girls... (Interruptions) We are taking two school children and two college going girls as part of our official delegation. Not as hangs on, but as part of our official delegation to convey to the world India's seriousness of doing something for the future generation. Sir, we cannot have 70 years old or 50 years old like me, talking about future generation. We could have the younger people talking about the future generation. That is why in the composition of our delegation, I think, you will see not only political representation but also generational representation.

Sir, there was a lot of confusion and a lot of criticism on the so-called differences between what my position has been and what the Prime Minister's articulation has been. Let me say, I am a Member of the Union Council of Ministers. I am a relatively junior Member of the Council of Ministers and it is inconceivable that I will survive in the Council if I articulate views that are different to that of the Prime Minister. You must, at least, grant me that much common sense that I will not say anything, which does not broadly correspond to what the Prime Minister believes. Occasionally, I might express it in a language that is colourful, I might express it in a language that more conservative people would not do so. But the thought, the principle, the concept, I cannot make public unless I know that the Prime Minister shares these views. That is the principle of collective responsibility and the principle of leadership. So, what are these new ideas that we have tried to bring into our thinking? We are going to Copenhagen in a positive frame of mind. Prepare to be - and I am using a word, which my Left friends are never happy with - flexible. I will define for you what flexibility means. We are going with a positive frame of mind; and we want a comprehensive and equitable agreement at Copenhagen. I am realistic enough to know that such an agreement may not materialize. But we will work overtime with likeminded countries, with China and other countries to ensure that there is a comprehensive and equitable arrangement.

.....Sir, I went to China over last weekend. China, South Africa, Brazil and India have tabled a draft in Copenhagen yesterday on what the Copenhagen Agreement should look like. Denmark as the host country also has a draft. But we participated in the discussions in Beijing and we came up with what we considered to be a draft which protects our interests. Let me also say for the information of the hon. Members that in the last few months, relations between India and China have had their ups and downs. But on the 21st of October, India and China signed a Partnership Agreement on Climate Change. This was the first agreement for China and the first agreement for India.

Now, China and India are not comparable. China is here with 23 per cent of world Green House Gas emissions. It is the number one emitter. India is here with 4.7 per cent of world Green House Gas emissions. It is number five in the world. So, we are not in the same boat as far as emissions are concerned. They have to do far more than what we have to do. But on negotiations, we are in the same boat. We have a strong alliance with China, a strong alliance with Brazil and a strong alliance with South Africa. We are also part of G-77. At the same time, many MPs have said about Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam. What does Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam mean? Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam means, you do not have hostility to anybody. So, we have to engage with everybody. Just because we are members of G-77 does not mean that we do not talk to America, and every time we talk to America does not mean that we are selling our country down the drain. So, I would like my Left friends to please understand the geopolitical realities in which India is. We are a developing country. We have global aspirations. We want to be recognised as a world power. But having global aspirations and assuming global responsibilities are two sides of the same coin. So, we are talking to everybody. We are talking to the Europeans. We are talking to the Americans. We have this agreement with the BASIC countries.

Dr. Murli Manohar Joshi: Mr. Minister, may I say a sentence? With flexibility, you will show the desired firmness.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: No, Sir. Let me explain. I am coming to this. If you have a little patience, I will explain to you what the contours of the flexibility are. Sir, there are some non-negotiables for us at Copenhagen. Let me categorically state what these non-negotiables are. My colleague, Mr. Mahtab is joining me in Copenhagen. This has not been fixed by me. This is a choice of the Speaker. He has already quoted what I have said on the non-negotiables. First one is.... The first non-negotiable is that India will not accept a legally binding emission reduction cut. We are not willing to accept any legally binding emissions reduction agreement. I want to say this absolutely, clearly and categorically. There is no question of India accepting a legally binding emission reduction target. Second, there are some attempts by some countries to say that developing countries should announce when their emissions will peak. Let me say that this is the second non-negotiable for us. We will not accept under any circumstances an agreement which stipulates a peaking year for India. If it is said that a country like India's emission profile will reach its peak by 2025 or 203, it will be impossible for us to accept this. We will not accept this agreement. These are the two complete, dark, bright, red lines, and there is no question of compromising on these two non-negotiables.

There is a third non-negotiable. Today, it is non-negotiable, but depends on the concessions that we can get from the western countries. Perhaps, we could modulate our position in consultation with China, Brazil and South Africa. We are prepared to subject all our mitigation actions, whatever we do, which is supported by international finance and technology to international review. There is nothing wrong with it as we are getting money from outside and we are getting technology from outside. The technology-giver and the money-giver is asking for scrutiny, we should have no objection. The problem arises on the mitigation actions, which are unsupported, that is, which we are doing on our own. We certainly would not like the unsupported actions to be subject to the same type of scrutiny that the supported actions are subject to. What we do with our own efforts and what we do with the help of others, there should be differentiation. Shri Raghuvansh had been talking about accountability during the last five years, and suggested that what we do with the cooperation of others will be separate and that we do ourselves will be separate. We can consider this, because we are a democratic country. We have a Parliament, we have a civil society, we have the media, we have greater accountability in our country compared to many other countries, We should have no problem if we were to say that we approach the problem from the long-term point of view. Hence, Dr. Joshi, very early on I mooted the concept of Nationally Accountable Mitigation Outcome. I want to tell you some thing of history. Under the Bali Action Plan, the responsibility of countries like us are restricted to National Appropriate Mitigation Action, only action; it is my experience that in our country there is no problem of action, we lack results and efforts. We are quite an expert in writing 500 pages, but on the outcome of that we are left behind.

Therefore I suggested for National Accountable Mitigation outcome and accountable to our parliament; not to any international organization. I do hope that you will appreciate that our accountability is to our parliament. I want that whatever we do should be under the laws made by our parliament. I want that whatever long-term accountability we have we have it should be to our parliament and not under any international agreement or under any international organization. Why there should be any problem with that, I do not understand? I was indeed surprised that this idea struck me in Beijing when I went there in September.

Shri Murli Manohar Joshi: There must have been some problem then!

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I will tell you the difference in the way we think and the way the people abroad think. We should recognize this because we think we know the entire science and what we do is ok. I want to tell you that there are other countries that also think; when I went to Beijing, I ask the Minister there what they were doing? He told me that they intend to bring a law in their National People's Congress, which is like our parliament, about China's policy about emissions. I started thinking that between China and democracy there was a vast difference, and if China could think of making a law in the National Peoples' Congress, Our country which is the world's largest democracy, why should we not do so in our country. Then only I thought of this and since then I am being criticized that I am speaking for someone else. But the fact is National Accountable Litigation outcome, meaning, we will come to the Parliament and if we say that by 2020 we shall install 20,000 MW solar power, then every year we should tell the parliament, what has been the deficit, what progress has been made, the members should have the right to ask all these questions. For this a law is necessary. I am ready for this. Where a law is required, we should have one, Whatever we do, it should be under our domestic law; not under international agreements: that is leadership: Our tendency is to wait till the last moment, we think there is still time, but the time passes; When we want to do something, people feel we are doing under pressure, We have to change, we have to plan anew, so that in international matters we can present our point of view: in this timing has a role to play.

China has announced a 40-45 per cent cut in emission intensity. Brazil has announced a 38 per cent cut in emissions. Indonesia has announced a 26 per cent cut in emissions. What is our response, we are below per capita, what is our responsibility in terms of population; with only 5 % responsible for green house emissions. But the world wants to know what are we thinking. We have not done any pollution for 200 years, but in the next few years we shall be making a contribution in this.

That is why I think we must be 'flexible' - I am sorry to use this word over and over again - without compromising our basic national interest. Basic national interest means no legally binding emission cuts, no legally binding emission peaking year and, as far as possible, distinguishing between supported mitigation action and unsupported mitigation action. Let me take a couple of minutes because I know, in the last few days, there has been a lot of speculation. What are we doing before Copenhagen? I want to make it absolutely clear that there is no pressure on us, We can tell in Copenhagen that whenever there is an international agreement we can commit ourselves that per capital emission of India will never exceed the per capita emission of the developed countries. We agreed with that.

We are prepared to reflect in any international agreement our per capita principle that Dr. Manmohan Singh our hon. Prime Minister enumerated last year. But, Sir, for India to show leadership, for India to have a moral position, because today we are talking of morality, of Gandhijee, We are the land of Mahatma Gandhi who is considered to be the Param Acharya of the environmental movement. Today the prime ministers and presidents of all the countries of the world want to go to Copenhagen, When in 1972 the first UN Conference on environment was held in Stockholm's, only one head of the state went there-and she was Mrs. Indira Gandhi. No other prime minister of any country went there, except the Swedish Prime Minister, because Swede was a host country. The country with a long tradition of environment, if it stays like a frog in the well and says nothing, the world will laugh at us. Is this the India that wants to take a global role and a global responsibility? But more importantly, India must show leadership to its own people, to Sunderbans, to Western Ghats, to Uttarakhand, to Himalayas, to the North-East. We must show action. What is that action? That is the issue now.

In the last few months, the Planning Commission has been doing a variety of exercises as part of the Midterm Appraisal of the 11th Plan. In the 12th Five-year plan, starting 2012 we have said that we will adopt low carbon strategy, a new model. It cannot happen overnight. A transition period is required. Next two years will be the transition period. We are committed that the next Five-year plan is based on low carbon emissions. This will happen for the first time and I think, it is in the interest of our country, our countrymen, the poor of this country and the farmers. What is the meaning of low carbon? Has it been examined in the planning commission? They have got statistics from many organizations. There is a thinking and I want to tell the parliament; I have not said this outside of parliament, because this is a sacred place, whatever I say in the parliament, I say it with full responsibility, I am not giving my personal opinion, this discussion in the House, as Shri Joshi said and many other members said, that if we have to go the low carbon way in the next ten, twenty years, if we have to give the world a new development model, then we need to think, what the speed of our emissions intensity will be. Between 1990 and 2005, our emission intensity declined by 17.6 per cent.

I am not talking about emissions, it is on the rise; but emission intensity is on the decline. What does 'intensity' mean? Intensity is a figure. Emission divided by GDP. The one you emit, and divide it with output, that is emission intensity. What does it mean? One of my colleagues said, be simple. I am trying to make it easy. Excuse me, whether I succeeded in it or not but I am trying. What is the meaning of emission intensity? It means, if the emission intensity comes down, then for one rupee of GDP there will be need for less emission, and it also means, with one unit of emission we get still more GDP. In the last fifteen years, between 1990-2000 the emission intensity came down by 17.6 percent and GDP increased. Emission increased but emission intensity came down. On empirical basis we can say with confidence that in the next 15-20 years emission intensity can further come down. Based on the exercises that the Mid-Term Appraisal in the 11th Five Year Plan, if the emission intensity has declined by 17.06 per cent between 1990 and 2005, the Planning Commission has concluded that we can have a 20 to 25 per cent reduction in emission intensity between 2005 and 2020. We are not taking this as a legal binding. We are not putting it down in any international agreement. We are telling the world, that India is unilaterally and voluntarily ready that in the next fifteen years by 2005 and 2020 will reduce the emission intensity by 20 to 25 percent. In the last fifteen years it went down by 17.6 percent. In the next 15 years it can come down between 20 to 25 percent. Most likely it can be 25 percent. What will happen at Copenhagen? We are going to do it because it is essential for our life security. We will show it in the mid-term review of the 11th Five-year plan and in the 12th Five-year plan that in the next 15 years Our emission intensity will reduce between 20 and 25 per cent.

I may tell you that the emission will increase but its speed will come down.

This should be clear. In the next 10-15 years until this transition takes place, this is what Mr. Joshi wants, the emission will go on increasing; but we can certainly take the responsibility that the speed of emission will come down; and with one unit of emission we can get still better output. You can ask if it is a political statement? Whether any home work has been done? ...interruption...I have to assure you fully..... Interruption...

How will this emission intensity be cut? That is the question. We are planning a series of policy measures. On some of which we will come back to Parliament. I want to assure the hon. Members of the House that we will come back to Parliament on: We are going to legislate mandatory fuel efficiency standards for our vehicles by December, 2011.

We will come to Parliament. We will mandate mandatory fuel efficiency standards for all vehicles. This will reduce and manage the greenhouse gas emissions from our transportation section. We will come back to Parliament with a model energy conservation building code and we will recommend to the States and to the Municipal Administrations mandatory green building codes. We are going to come to Parliament with amendments to the Energy Conservation Act to introduce what we call the energy efficiency certificate which will enable energy intensity decline in our industry.

We will come to Parliament. Parliament will discuss these amendments.

I am going to lay this Report on Forests on the Table of the House hopefully next week. We are going to come to Parliament regularly to report on the state of our forest cover. Today, in response to the question raised by many Members, our forests are absorbing 10 per cent of our annual greenhouse gas emissions. I will come back to Parliament on that. We are going to ensure that increasingly more and more of our coal based power plants of the type that are coming up in my friend, Shri Mahtab's State which is causing him great concern, will come from clean coal technology.

This does not require law. It requires us to take decisions on super critical technology, ultra super critical technology, coal gasification - Dr. Joshi knows as when he was the Minister for Science and Technology many of these initiatives had started. We will ensure that 50 per cent of all new capacity that is going to come will be based on clean coal technology. That will substantially reduce the CO<sub>2</sub> emissions from our power stations. So, we have an action plan in transportation, industry, buildings, forestry and in various sectors of our economy which will ensure 20 to 25 per cent cut in energy intensity between 2005 and 2020. At Copenhagen if we have a successful agreement, if we have an equitable agreement, if we are satisfied with this agreement, we are prepared to do even more. This is the base line for us. This we will do ourselves, not with the help of any body else. We will reduce ourselves our emission intensity by 29 to 25 percent. If there is help from the international community, if the Copenhagen Agreement is reached successfully, is an equitable agreement, our doubts are removed, then we are prepared to say that we can do even more than this.

Now I will summaries it: I separate domestic responsibility from international obligation. I want to be aggressive on domestic obligation and I want to be pro-active on international obligation because in international obligation there is only one thing that counts. Ultimately, when I go to Copenhagen, it is not G-77 or China or America or Brazil or South Africa, it is India's interest that counts. What is in India's interest? That is what ultimately is the only deciding factor. What is in India's interest, that is what we have to do. I believe that our negotiating position is strengthened considerably if we go to Copenhagen from a position of leadership, taking these pro-active measures and taking the responsibility as part of the 11th Five Year Plan, 12th Five Year Plan and thereafter between 2005 to 2020 our emission intensity would reduce by 20 per cent to 25 per cent on our own, in a legally non-binding agreement and to be reflected in any international agreement. Sir, I want to thank the hon. Members for listening to me very patiently. I know that many of your doubts may still be there but I do want to assure the hon. Members that when I used the word 'flexibility', it does not mean the sell out. Flexibility only means the ability to move to rapidly evolving international situations. We are not living in isolation. We are living in an international community. We have to see what is happening in the world. We are a large country. Let us not be defensive about ourselves. Let not any Minister who is going abroad be told: 'Do not sell the country'. It is an insult to my personal honour and dignity to be told: 'Do not go and sell the country's honour'. No Government, no Minister, no Prime Minister and no Minister for Environment will do that. We are going there to get the best agreement for India and the best agreement for India internationally is what we do domestically. What we do domestically, in my view, is an obligation to our own people that we have to undertake. Now, I thank you for this opportunity.

116. Interview of Jairam Ramesh Minister of State for Environment and Forests with Nitin Seth of the daily Times of India.

New Delhi, December 5, 2009.

Q: Do you see Thursday as a clear mandate for flexibility for the government?

A: It was good as far as it goes. A broad mandate and there are people who still have doubts and questions. It's only a period of time... we will be able to address their questions. What Thursday demonstrates in my view is the absolute importance of taking Parliament into confidence at every step. Every government tries to take Parliament for granted and we tend to go to Parliament at the end stage. I have engaged Parliament from day one, through letters. I wish this debate had been held in an earlier session.

But it was good. It was surprisingly substantive and not personalised like the Rajya Sabha debate. I think that is what added value to the exercise. There is a mandate for flexibility. There is no question about it. Let me put it this way, there is a mandate for constrained flexibility. It's not unlimited. It's defined within the parameters that there will be no peaking year and no compromise on the legally binding nature of the commitment that we take.

Q: But you got some room on the issue of MRV (international scrutiny of unsupported Indian actions)?

A: I think there we have got room. That was a big step forward. Much to the discomfort of many people, including activists and journalists, we have moved the debate on MRV inch by inch. And frankly my position is... my advantage is I have worked in both. finance and commerce, I know how these functions are performed. The PM knows it because he has been in finance for donkey's years. There is no black box in this system if we are not hiding anything. You cannot equate the IAEA type of review with the WTO type of reviews, because in the IAEA type of review you don't want to review some strategic assets. But the whole world knows your financial data, whom are you hiding from? Today, the best reports on Indian economy are produced by investment bankers sitting in New York. They have all the databases. Even how much foreign exchange we have, it is all known.

See, there are two issues in my view -- the debate in India has not really been on a realistic level. The MRV debate is one of them. We were stuck in a position. This difference between supported action and unsupported action is largely overdrawn. Bulk of our actions are going to be unsupported actions. As a negotiating tactic, it is good but we must distinguish the negotiating tactic from a operational strategy. As an operational strategy, this distinction does not make much sense to me... that is why I took the position on MRV. But look, let's put everything in the public domain, and while you can have an MRV in the western sense of the word of the supported actions, you can have a consultative process in the IMF/WTO sense of the term for unsupported actions. For that I got some support from Parliament on Thursday.

On technology also, the debate is unrealistic in this country. You cannot compare the IPR issue in the pharmaceutical industry to climate change. You are talking of a product patent or a process patent for a molecule. Here you are talking of a whole array of technologies.

The same IPR issues that dominated the pharmaceutical debate are now coming to dominate the climate change debate. It's a different class of technology issues we have to deal with. I think we have not really thought through. The fact that we continue to use the word technology transfer... I am saying from day one it's not technology transfer, it's technology development and other things.

One thing that was missed on Thursday by the media... the biggest gain was the idea of a domestic law. You saw the thumping of desks. That was a big thing. Of course, the opinion is divided in the government whether you should do a comprehensive law or a piecemeal law. We have to do a law for things like fuel efficiency; my idea was to put it all into one national greenhouse gas mitigation law. By the way, I got the biggest cheers for that. The NAMO concept has now been accepted domestically. That was a big gain.

Q: A part of the government still has problem that when you delink technology and finance from actions, you take away one of the planks of Bali Action Plan and that weakens your negotiating position.

A: I think after the emission intensity cuts, our negotiating position has instead strengthened, it has not weakened. It's strengthened when we demonstrated flexibility on the MRV issue. We were the ones who brought in the concept of two year enhanced NATCOM that will bring in supported and unsupported action. It was India's contribution.

Q: But Thursday gave you width for more than that.

A: Yes.

Q: Today we heard Arun Jaitley.

A: Yes.

Q: The most contentious point was the population issue -- you calling it a historical error. Everyone has made statements against that. You could have projected India as having done so much better at carbon intensity despite the large population. The accusation is that you have thrown the plank of convergence of per capita emissions away.

A: But the fact of the matter is it is a historical accident that our per capita emissions are so low. If we had controlled our population and all our Plan targets had been met, we would have been sitting at 23% emissions today. The fact that we did not fulfill any of our planned targets -- this is the law of unintended consequences. The fact that we did not fulfill our power addition targets...

Q: But in India this evokes the Emergency era population control issues.

A: Theek hai yaar, (This is ok) we have to think beyond. I have said per capita is a base, it's a starting point. For one-and-a-half years, it was the only plank of our negotiations. Can it be the only plank? My argument is that it cannot.

Q: In your view, is per capita convergence of emissions at 2050 central to Indian position?

A: Theek hai (ok), we can work towards 2 tonnes per capita.

Q: So it's not central to the Indian position?

A: There are too many things to be gained at a larger scale. Let's see how it pans out; there are too many things to be gained at a larger scale. We are not abandoning the per capita idea. We will reflect the per capita commitment in any international agreement. But the weakness of our position was that it was the only thing we were offering. And frankly it had become a sleeper of an argument.

Q: What is the most optimistic deal one can expect out of Copenhagen? Not a comprehensive deal?

A: No, that is not on the cards. Look at the way the Danish draft and the BASIC draft -- the contrast between them. I don't understand what the Danes meant when they said they want a politically binding agreement but that seems like the only thing that is feasible.

Q: But you have asked what that phrase means?

A: Yes we have. Right now we don't know what it means. The Danes unveiled their version of a politically binding agreement -- it was asking for commitments. The BASIC draft was in that sense more realistic, it took everyone along. The Brazilians have now apparently dropped a spanner in the works by saying that the idea of a separate schedule for the Americans is not acceptable to them.

Q: I haven't read this.

A: Someone told me this on Thursday. And if that is the case, we are back to square one. The Brazilians are saying that by giving a window to the Americans, we are giving the Europeans a reason to further fight. It's a bit of Catch-22 situation. They agreed to the BASIC statement in Beijing.

Q: Now that you have a set of targets, will this become the business as usual line for India? You said we will do more if we get technology and finance.

A: In fact, in my view, the way we are headed with our actions, our actual intensity decline would probably be knocking on 25% rather than 20%.

Q: But will that become the benchmark for the country for others to ask more internationally now?

A: We might in fact cross 25% in the country. The key to this is that 50% of our coal based capacity in 12th Plan is supercritical. And if we ensure over 75% of our capacity in 13th Plan is supercritical, I can give a guarantee that we could be closer to 30%.

Q: Are you talking about emission intensity or carbon intensity?

A: Emission intensity as measured in CO<sub>2</sub> per unit of GDP.

Q: Only CO<sub>2</sub>?

A: We have left it open. We can't give everything away.

Q: What is the worst that could happen at Copenhagen if things don't thaw?

A: I am actually worried. Because this peaking year issue is a bummer. I have told the Danes that peaking year will not be acceptable to us. We will not be able to carry forward any discussions if this becomes a sticking point. I said we will be flexible on MRVs and on emission intensity that we were likely to announce. They are now looking at an alternative formulation. I have said we will agree to a formulation that says we remain below two degrees if it is qualified by the clause of equitable burden sharing.

117. Editorial on Climate Changed which was carried by 56 newspapers in 45 countries. In India it was carried by the Hindu.

Chennai, December 7, 2009.

Today 56 newspapers in 45 countries take the unprecedented step of speaking with one voice through a common editorial. We do so because humanity faces a profound emergency. Unless we combine to take decisive action, climate change will ravage our planet, and with it our prosperity and security. The dangers have been becoming apparent for a generation. Now the facts have started to speak: 11 of the past 14 years have been the warmest on record, the Arctic ice-cap is melting, and last year's inflated oil and food prices provide a foretaste of future havoc. In scientific journals the question is no longer whether humans are to blame, but how little time we have got left to limit the damage. Yet so far the world's response has been feeble and half-hearted.

Climate change has been caused over centuries, has consequences that will endure for all time, and our prospects of taming it will be determined in the next 14 days. We call on the representatives of the 192 countries gathered in Copenhagen not to hesitate, not to fall into dispute, not to blame each other but to seize opportunity from the greatest modern failure of politics. This should not be a fight between the rich world and the poor world, or between east and west. Climate change affects everyone, and must be solved by everyone. The science is complex but the facts are clear. The world needs to take steps to limit temperature rises to 2C, an aim that will require global emissions to peak and begin falling within the next 5-10 years. A bigger rise of 3-4C - the smallest increase we can prudently expect to follow inaction - would parch continents, turning farmland into desert. Half of all species could become extinct, untold millions of people would be displaced, whole nations drowned by the sea.

Few believe that Copenhagen can any longer produce a fully polished treaty; real progress towards one could only begin with the arrival of President Obama in the White House and the reversal of years of US obstructionism. Even now the world finds itself at the mercy of American domestic politics, for the President cannot fully commit to the action required until the US Congress has done so. But the politicians in Copenhagen can and must agree the essential elements of a fair and effective deal and, crucially, a firm timetable for turning it into a treaty. Next June's UN climate meeting in Bonn should be their deadline. As one negotiator put it: "We can go into extra time but we can't afford a replay."

At the deal's heart must be a settlement between the rich world and the developing world covering how the burden of fighting climate change will be divided - and how we will share a newly precious resource: the trillion or so tonnes of carbon that we can emit before the mercury rises to dangerous levels. Rich nations like to point to the arithmetic truth that there can be no solution until developing giants such as China take more radical steps than they have so far. But the rich world is responsible for most of the accumulated carbon in the atmosphere - three-quarters of all carbon dioxide emitted since 1850. It must now take a lead, and every developed country must commit to deep cuts which will reduce its emissions within a decade to very substantially less than its 1990 level. Developing countries can point out they did not cause the bulk of the problem, and also that the poorest regions of the world will be hardest hit. But they will increasingly contribute to warming, and must thus pledge meaningful and quantifiable action of their own. Though both fell short of what some had hoped for, the recent commitments to emissions targets by the world's biggest polluters, the United States and China, were important steps in the right direction.

Social justice demands that the industrialised world digs deep into its pockets and pledges cash to help poorer countries adapt to climate change, and clean technologies to enable them to grow economically without growing their emissions. The architecture of a future treaty must also be pinned down - with rigorous multilateral monitoring, fair rewards for protecting forests, and the credible assessment of "exported emissions" so that the burden can eventually be more equitably shared between those who produce polluting products and those who consume them. And fairness requires that the burden placed on individual developed countries should take into account their ability to bear it; for instance newer EU members, often much poorer than "old Europe," must not suffer more than their richer partners.

The transformation will be costly, but many times less than the bill for bailing out global finance - and far less costly than the consequences of doing nothing. Many of us, particularly in the developed world, will have to change our lifestyles. The era of flights that cost less than the taxi ride to the airport is drawing to a close. We will have to shop, eat, and travel more intelligently. We will have to pay more for our energy, and use less of it. But the shift to a low-carbon society holds out the prospect of more opportunity than sacrifice. Already some countries have recognised that embracing the transformation can bring growth, jobs, and better quality lives. The flow of capital tells its own story: last year for the first time more was invested in renewable forms of energy than producing electricity from fossil fuels. Kicking our carbon habit within a few short decades will require a feat of engineering and innovation to match anything in our history. But whereas putting a man on the moon or splitting the atom were born of conflict and competition, the coming carbon race must be driven by a collaborative effort to achieve collective salvation.

Overcoming climate change will take a triumph of optimism over pessimism, of vision over shortsightedness, of what Abraham Lincoln called "the better angels of our nature." It is in that spirit that 56 newspapers from around the world have united behind this editorial. If we, with such different national and political perspectives, can agree on what must be done then surely our leaders can too. The politicians in Copenhagen have the power to shape history's judgment on this generation: one that saw a challenge and rose to it, or one so stupid that saw calamity coming but did nothing to avert it. We implore them to make the right choice.

118. The question of Conflicting Statements on climate change raised in the Rajya Sabha with the Permission of the Chair by the Leader of the Opposition.

New Delhi, December 7, 2009.

The Leader of the Opposition (Shri Arun Jaitley):

Mr. Deputy Chairman, Sir, two weeks ago, this hon. House called the attention of the Minister on the issue of India's stand in the Climate Change Negotiations. And, this House was categorically assured by the hon. Minister, in the course of the discussion, that there would be no substantial change from the stand that this country had adopted over the last 17 years in these negotiations. The Minister also said that he will take Parliament into confidence before he proceeds to Copenhagen and the country's stand is spelt out. Sir, this Calling Attention was called in the backdrop of some apprehension that the Minister was not in agreement with the stand of the Government of India, which was being conventionally taken. Now, we find that the hon. Minister and the Government of India, have unilaterally altered their position substantially over what India has been saying all these years. We have now announced, without waiting for what developed countries say, that we are going to make a 20-25 per cent cut in our carbon intensity on the 2005-level till 2020. Now, this country has, consistently, followed a policy that there is a per capita principle, that is, we have as much a share as members of developing countries in the carbon space, as much as a citizen of a developed country has. The hon. Minister had addressed a letter to certain Members of Parliament, and I also received this letter, on the 29th of September, 2009, where till 29th September, the Minister has said, and I quote from his letter: "The equal per capita entitlement principle is the only legitimate internationally acknowledged measure for reflecting equity. As stated by our hon. Prime Minister, India's per capita emission levels will never exceed the per capita emission levels of the developed countries." Today, Sir, what appears to be happening is that the legally binding cut, which the developed country had to face, is something that they want to get out of, as a result of which various drafts are being internationally circulated. And, as a part of those drafts, one of the suggestions being made is, "Please go by domestic measures". What we seemed to have done is, we completely altered our principle; irrespective of what the developed world does, we have unilaterally announced that we are going to make cuts of 20-25 per cent. Now, Sir, our difficulty today is that a major part of this negotiation, the deal, is still to be settled. Who is going to make the entire investment involved in India, as also in the various developing countries, as far as this reduction of carbon intensity or emission intensity of 20-25 per cent over the next few years is concerned?

Sir, when the business was as usual between 1990 and 2005 ... (Interruptions)... Sir, I will just take a minute or two more. Between 1990 and 2005, we had in this emission intensity a 17.6 per cent cut. That was one per cent compounded annually. Now, if we are to achieve this figure, then a lot of investment would be required because it would be almost about one-and-a-half per cent per year which is required till 2020. Now, one of the essential aspects of this deal has to be as to who is to bear the cost. Is the cost to be borne by those who are the victims of environmental pollution or is the cost to be borne by those who have substantially polluted the environment? Now, Sir, the original understanding was that there would be substantial cuts being made by the developed countries, and today, having really bared our hands completely on the eve of negotiations, we do not know what the developed countries are going to do. Experts in the field are now indicating that the cuts will only be three to four per cent on the 1990 emission levels, as far as the developed countries are concerned, and we would be rendered completely helpless in a situation of this kind. Sir, there are two or three aspects I wish to highlight. It is bad strategy for the Government of India on the eve of a crucial negotiation to bare its hands and disclose all its cards. Our disclosed cards today become the baseline of further negotiations. We have raised our own baseline which was absolutely not necessary. Secondly, Sir, today, we have no reciprocity in return. Thirdly, we are in a state of turmoil on the eve of these negotiations. The negotiations' first phase begins today itself. Our negotiators appear to be sulking. From what has appeared in the newspapers, some of them, day-before-yesterday, refused to board the flight and said, 'unless we have a clear assurance from the Government of India that we will not be really reversing our stand, we are not willing to go'. And, lastly, Sir, the question was also asked by one of our colleagues in the Question Hour as to what is the international observation or verification of our unsupported domestic actions. Sir, earlier our stand categorically was this will never be acceptable. Now, the Minister has now coined a new buzz word which is flexibility. And, flexibility says, we will see, if necessary, we will allow it. His interview to one of the leading newspapers of the country almost seems to indicate that we will allow that also. Now, this is, entirely, Sir, unacceptable, and I suggest, Sir, that the Government gives a categorical assurance to this House that there will be no change in India's categorical stand which has been there all these years on this subject.

.....Interruptions

Shri Sitaram Yechury: I am going to give him a hint of what I am going to say in Copenhagen also. The Minister, Sir, had assured the Parliament and the country that there are two red lines that will not be crossed. One is that there will be no binding emission cuts that will be acceptable to India. Second is that there will be no deadline of peaking of our emissions. Now, whatever has been stated earlier and what the Minister has been stating now in the media somehow seems to contradict this. Our voluntary announcement of 20 to 25 per cent reduction; we presume, it is on reduction in carbon intensity because it is gone by the past record of 17 per cent reduction from 1990 to 2005, which is the compound rate of one per cent per year. Now, whether it is emission intensity or energy intensity or carbon intensity, these three are very different concepts and impact on the country differently. We do not know what the Government is talking about. But, presuming it is carbon intensity, it means that by 2020, we will have to reduce by 150 per cent of what we have reduced in the last 15 years. What does it mean? Today, 55 crores of my countrymen do not have electricity, 70 crores of my countrymen survive on bio-gas fuels without any carbon emission.

If this 1.5 per cent reduction is to be brought about, then it will come at the expense of the two-thirds of India. Are we today prepared to widen the gap between the rich and the poor in the country as a result of this, and has it come under any pressure? That is my point. The pressure is that on the 4th December, the White House releases a press note. I am reading from it, Sir, which is a public document. It says, "After months of diplomatic activity, there is progress being made towards a meaningful Copenhagen accord in which all countries pledge to take action against the global threat of climate change." No annexure-1 or annexure-2. No division between the developed and the developing. "Following bilateral meetings with the President and since the United States announced an emissions reduction target that reflects the progress being made in Congress towards comprehensive energy legislation, China and India have for the first time set targets to reduce their carbon intensity. There has also been progress in advancing the Danish proposal for an immediate, operational accord that covers all of the issues under negotiation."

Danish proposal is document where there is no differentiation between the developed and the developing countries. Hours after this was announced, the Prime Minister of India announces that he is also going. So, the suspicion that comes up is, is this happening under pressure? Therefore, Sir, since you asked us to restrict our time, I would be brief. Article 4, para 7 of the framework so far clearly talks in terms of annexure-1 and annexure-2 countries and the responsibility of the developed world. Therefore, Sir, we want assurances from the hon. Minister. Firstly, the per capita emission standards cannot be diluted. It cannot be given up. Secondly, the historical responsibility of advanced countries must be ensured. Thirdly, the cut-off date that has been changed from 1990 to 2005 should not be accepted, we should stick to 1990; and, our voluntary cuts must be conditional upon three things. One, that the developed countries ensure a mandatory cut in their emissions. Two, the financing of the shift to greener technologies will be provided and they take much of the burden on financing of such a transfer to greener technologies. Three, the transfer of technologies should be beyond the purview of the Intellectual Property Rights and they should be transferred to the Third World without this Intellectual Property Rights royalties. We want these assurances from the Minister.

SHRI D. RAJA: Sir, agreeing with the speakers before me, I would like to draw the attention of the House to one international climate scheme. Our Government has been supporting on international climate scheme called REDD, Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Degradation of Forests. Even though this scheme the scheme has major implications for the livelihood of crores of Adivasis and forest dwellers, the Government has never publicly discussed this scheme. Even the issue was not discussed in Parliament. The proposed scheme would make it possible for companies and Governments to earn tradable carbon credits from forest protection in developing countries. Our Government has gone beyond this and wants aforestation and plantation projects to be eligible for carbon credit also.

Sir, as of now, the Forest Right Act, 2006 is not being properly implemented in many areas. When the Government is not giving the people secure rights to their lands and forests, what can the Government do to prevent companies and Government agencies grabbing the same lands to earn carbon credits under this scheme? The Government's aforestation programmes are already resulting in conflict, in many States, for instance in Orissa, Andhra Pradesh and Chhattisgarh. So, my point is, the Government must be very categorical and clear on what it is going to do. Replacing natural open areas with mono-cultural plantations...

Mr. Deputy Chairman: No, the subject is, 'conflicting statements' and not on this, please.

Shri D. Raja: Sir, no, it is part of Copenhagen Summit that is beginning today. It is part of the climate scheme and the Government's position.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: That we have already discussed. This is only on 'conflicting statements.'

Shri D. Raja: Sir, this is a new thing which the Government has been supporting and the Government has not discussed it in Parliament!

Mr. Deputy Chairman: That is correct, I am not disputing it. But the question which we have admitted is.... (Interruptions)

Shri D. Raja: What I am trying to say is, the Government cannot support this international scheme REDD. If Government has anything like this, Government should share what Government is going to do in Copenhagen. That is what we are asking the Minister. Let him respond.

Shri Sitaram Yechury: Government should take it seriously because Mr. Raja is opposing REDD! You please understand. If Mr. Raja is opposing REDD, it is a serious matter.

Shri D. Raja: So my humble request is, Sir,...

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Your three minutes are also over.

Shri D. Raja: Let him respond.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, I am grateful for yet another opportunity for clarifying and before I go on Thursday, I am sure there will be more opportunities of such topics raised. So, I am grateful that...

Shri Arun Jaitley: Mr. Yechury is also going to be with you. So, we are going to keep an eye on you even there.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Dr. Swaminathan also will be there. Sir, I am grateful to the Leader of the Opposition. Today, the discussion has not been oriented towards me personally and has been substantive on issues of climate change unlike the Calling Attention Motion where I felt as if I was an accused on a trial. Sir, let me respond to whatever each of these speakers have said in as serious a manner as possible.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: And as briefly as possible.

Shri Jairam Ramrsh: Yes, as briefly as possible. But, allow me to say Sir, that I am sometimes perplexed by the shifting stands of our distinguished Leader of the Opposition. When I meet the Leader of the Opposition outside this hall, I get one view and when he stands up and speaks as the Leader of the Opposition, I get a different view. But, Sir, that is inherent in our political system.

Shri M. Venkaiah Naidu: It is unbecoming on the part of a leader to mention something what is being said outside. Sir, it is never done. It is never done. (Interruptions) Sir, he should withdraw it. (Interruptions)

Mr. Deputy Chairman: No, no, I think, in the interest of the...(Interruptions)...What you discuss privately should not form a part of it. (Interruptions) What they discuss privately should not be part of this. (Interruptions)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, let me respond. (Interruptions)

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Please sit down. (Interruptions) Please don't refer to your personal conversation.

Shri S. S. Ahluwalia: One should not refer to a personal conversation. You talk only about this issue. (Interruptions)

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Let us confine to what is going on inside the House.

Shri Arun Jaitley: Since he has referred, let me clarify it. At the major economies forum after the Government of India diluted its stand I felt quite happy as most of India did when the US Secretary of State was here and their Environment negotiator referred to our stand a diluted stand there. The Minister had the courage to stand up and contradict that. We all congratulated him. So did I. But, after he shifted his position in the Lok Sabha, I categorically told him that I disagree with his stand.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, I will not get into this any further. I will respond to the points that have been raised. Sir, let me first talk about the non-negotiables which will continue to be non-negotiables till the 18th of December, 2009 and beyond. The first non-negotiable is that we will under no circumstances accept a legally, binding emission reduction cut. This is my first point. Secondly, we will not reflect whatever we do, the emission intensive cut as an example. This is not an internationally legally binding commitment. This is a unilateral domestic obligation that we have taken in our own interest and we are announcing to the world that this is what we are going to do as part of the 12th and 13th Plan and if you want us to better it, if you want us to you have to reflect it internationally you have to support us both in terms of finance and technology. This is the second non-negotiable.

The third non-negotiable is: we comprehensively and categorically reject the notion of a peak India. We will, under no circumstances, accept any draft which suggests that India's emissions should peak by 2025, 2030, 2040, 2045. This is simply not on our agenda.

Sir, the fourth non-negotiable is this. Please bear with me. Sir, since there is a fine distinction involved here and this has caused much consternation amongst the Members of Parliament, I would like to respond to it as openly and transparently as I can. The fourth nonnegotiable is: Why we accept international scrutiny of supported actions?

We will not accept the same level of international scrutiny and the same type of international scrutiny for the unsupported actions. So, wherever the world supports us in terms of finance and technology, they can come and verify what we are doing. But, where you are not supporting us -- the bulk of our actions will be unsupported actions -- we will not subject these actions to international scrutiny. However, we are in an open system. We are in a democratic system. We are accountable to Parliament. What I have stated and what the Government of India's position is, we are prepared to submit to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change a national communication, say, once in two years, which will have both the supported and unsupported actions for consideration of the UNFCCC. That is all we have said, Sir. There will be a scrutiny only when we are supported financially and technologically. But, for the unsupported actions, we are only going to submit a report - - of course, we will come before Parliament with -- to the UNCCC for consideration. Sir, please bear with me...

Shri Sitaram Yechury: But then, why submitting a report?

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Please bear with me. We have nothing to hide. Our country has nothing to hide.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Why do you want to submit a report?

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam, can I please finish?

We have nothing to hide. All that we do is in the public domain. We have a National Action Plan on Climate Change. We have a Plan document. Everything is debated in Parliament. We come to Parliament and say that this is the extent to which our solar energy plan has gone. This is the extent to which our energy efficiency plan has been implemented. And whatever information we are putting in the public domain, we are going to give it to international consideration. What is wrong with this? I am not saying international scrutiny. International scrutiny means, international observers coming, asking questions, looking at...

Shri S. S. Ahluwalia: You don't require any observer.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: What is consideration? Please define what you mean by the word 'consideration.'

Shri S.S. Ahluwalia: Through big boss satellite they can observe everything. They do not need to send a man here.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Mr. Ahluwalia, please listen to me. These are not nuclear power plants we are talking about which need to protect. These things are all in open. We are not doing anything secretly.

Shri Sitaram Yechury: What is consideration?

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, consideration will be defined by the UNFCCC. This is all going to be based on the guidelines. What is our proposal? Our proposal is according to guidelines framed by the UNFCCC. This is our proposal. But, according to the guidelines of the UNFCCC, we will subject all the supported actions to international scrutiny. Unsupported actions will not invite international scrutiny but will be a part of our reporting to the UNFCCC. Sir, it cannot be any hon. Member of Parliament's case that what we have made public to Parliament cannot form a part of the document that we are going to submit to an intentional body. That is not the case.

Shri Sitaram Yechury: Actually, the point is...

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Can I finish? Then, you can seek any clarification you want. You let me finish. I am trying to explain the whole thing.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: It is not a debate; it is only clarifications.

Shri Sitaram Yechury: Sir, it is a very important subject.

Mr. Deputy Chairman: I agree that it is important...(Interruptions)...

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I am trying to come clean as much as I can. I am not trying to hide anything. I feel the transparency is the best way to strengthen one's negotiating position. I would like to reassure this House, categorically, that this proposal does not mean international monitoring, reporting and verification of our unsupported actions.

It does not mean that. I would like to reassure the Leader of Opposition and I would like to reassure my colleague who is coming to Copenhagen with me that this is not what it means. All that it means is, there will be a document which we will submit to the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change, which will be once in two or three years, whatever is decided, but will have a compendium of all our actions on climate change wherever the international community has supporters, financially and technologically, but will be verified. Everything else will be just there for information. And our accountability, ultimately,

Sir, as I said in the Lok Sabha, is to Parliament and Parliament alone. In fact, Sir, if the hon. Leader of the Opposition could kindly re-read the letter I have sent him, my proposal is that we convert all our national appropriate mitigation actions to a nationally accountable mitigation outcome. You may read that letter. Mr. Javadekar will recall --I have spoken to him-- that I would like, not NAMA, which is what the world is talking about, but NAMO. And, what is NAMO? NAMO is, to come to Parliament and tell Parliament every year that this is what we are doing in climate change. If I am not accountable to Parliament, whom am I going to be accountable to? Our primary and only accountability is to Parliament, not to any international organisation. So, please, be reassured. Now, this debate is taking place in the Government whether we should have a comprehensive legislation or whether we should have piecemeal legislation. Once this debate is settled, we will come back to Parliament, but I want to reassure and reiterate to the distinguished Leader of the Opposition that my accountability on all the actions on behalf of the Government of India is to Parliament, and what reports we put out to Parliament, we will make available to any international body. I do not say...

Shri Sitaram Yechury: Sir,...

Shri Jairam Ramesh: May I finish? (Interruptions) Whatever reports that we come to the Parliament with will be in the public domain.

(Interruptions)

Mr. Deputy Chairman: What is this? You are extending the scope of Zero Hour. You are converting it into a debate. This is not correct. (Interruptions)

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, please, can I finish?

Sir, the hon. Leader of the Opposition talked of reciprocity. It is true that our 20-25 per cent emission intensity cut offer by 2020 is a unilateral offer, not dependent on reciprocity. Now, why did we do this?

I don't mind sharing this with you, Sir. Every major country in the world has a major offer on the table. We also have an offer on the table. But, under no circumstances, our per capita emissions should exceed -I have taken your caution and not using the word 'below'-- the emissions of the developed world. That is our offer on the table. I believe, our emission intensity offer, which is a unilateral offer, which is a domestic offer, which is a non-legally binding offer, strengthens our negotiating position to demand greater cuts from the West. We have to negotiate...(Interruptions) May I finish, and then you can respond to what I said?

The Leader of Opposition (Shri Arun Jaitley): Since you are on the issue, you might as well just clarify this. Quite to the contrary, it demolishes your negotiating position because the moment you say that my per capita emission will be lower than yours, this is my existing offer and I am now going to further lower it by 20-25 per cent, whether you reduce or not, it means that you completely destroy the per capita equity argument which we have conventionally taken.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I am afraid, the hon. Leader of the Opposition is profoundly mistaken on this. Let me say that the Chinese have offered a 40-45 per cent cut.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Their emissions are so many more times...(Interruptions)...

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Madam, we have gone through this in a Calling Attention Motion. We can have one more round of discussions on this. The Brazilians have offered a cut. The Indonesians have offered a cut. The Mexicans have offered a cut. It is true that last year we voluntarily offered our per capita emission constraint. That remains a constraint as far as we are concerned. We are not going to deviate from the per capita principle. I want to reassure the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the two pillars of our negotiating strategy remain the per capita convergence, ultimately, which is the only equity instrument that I have pointed out in my letter, and the historical responsibility.

It is because of the historical responsibility that we will refuse to take legally-binding targets of any kind. The hon. Leader has asked what is flexibility. Sir, whatever we have done we are not going to be in a position to better whatever we have done unless there are substantial emission cuts made by the developed countries, unless there is a substantial financial package offered by the developed countries and unless there is a substantial liberalisation of technology flows by the developed countries. This we have made amply clear. I made this clear in my statement in the Lok Sabha as well that there is absolutely no doubt in our mind that any further movement on India's part is conditioned on three things, that is, a substantial improvement on emission cuts by the developed countries, a substantial financial package by the developed countries and a substantial liberalisation of technology flows by the developed countries. Sir, as far as the timing of the American Press release is concerned, I also got to know about it; I saw it later and I can assure this House that this was not done under any foreign pressure.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Sir, ..(Interruptions)..

Shri Jairam Ramesh: In fact, if Madam can bear with me, this exercise has been going on for the last couple of months. The Planning Commission, as a part of the Mid-Term Appraisal, has consulted a large number of independent bodies, individuals and think-tanks and the consensus view that emerged as part of the Mid-Term Appraisal was that without jeopardising our economic growth, without jeopardising our poverty alleviation and without jeopardising our electricity supply target to every household, we can take a 20 to 25 per cent cut in our emission intensity which means our emissions would still continue to grow, but our emission intensity would fall. I plead with the hon. House to give some time for this to work out and I can assure the House that if this emerges as a constraint we would be the first to re-look at it. But I am confident in my mind that emission intensity will not jeopardise the prospects. The hon. Leader of the CPM has rightly pointed that we are going to Copenhagen with the objective of not accepting any agreement that would put a constraint on expanding electricity supply to rural households, for livelihood security and for all the other economic objectives. Sir, as far as the point that my distinguished colleague who is opposing REDD is concerned, the REDD Proposal was made by Brazil and Indonesia who are contributing to deforestation and who wants financial incentives to stop deforestation. India took the lead for saying that okay if you are giving financial incentives for stopping deforestation, what about giving financial incentives for reforestation. That is our REDD plus proposal. It is not secret. It is in the public domain. I have sent you a copy of what our REDD plus proposal is. It is there in the letter that I have written to you, and I want to re-assure you that if there is any REDD Plus project in India which violates the Forest Rights Act, 2006, it is simply not acceptable. I want to tell you this categorically. In fact, I don't know whether you are aware that two months' ago from my Ministry we have issued a guideline that henceforth all clearances under the Forest Conservation Act ..(Interruptions)..

That all clearances under the Forests Conservation Act, 1980 will be given only after the Forest Rights Act, 2006 is fully implemented. In fact, this is one of the grounds in which we have issued a letter to the Orissa Government on the Niyamgiri project that the Forest Rights Act, 2006 is not implemented.

..(Interruptions)..

Sir, let me summarize. ..(Interruptions).. Let me summarize. ..(Interruptions)..

Sir, our negotiating team is in Copenhagen. We have over ten Negotiators in Copenhagen. It is true that one or two Negotiators had some questions on my statements. I have had a discussion with them. I have tried to convince them that there is no dilution of our stand and these two Negotiators are going to Copenhagen in a day or two. In closing, I want to re-assure this House that while stands do evolve over time in response to changing circumstances, there is a certain basic code which we are not violating. We are not violating the per capita principle. We are not going to transgress the historical responsibility...(Interruptions). Actions speak louder than words.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: But, now, only words are speaking...(Interruptions).

Mr. Deputy Chairman: Now, we are converting it into another Calling Attention Motion, another debate. But, there is no further scope under Zero Hour, and only because there was an understanding...(Interruptions).

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, I would suggest to the hon. Member to give a notice for Calling Attention Motion on 20th of December, and I will respond to my actions, and not to my words...(Interruptions).

Mr. Deputy Chairman: 20th December is Sunday.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, I mean, on 21st December.

Sitaram Yechury: Sir, I would suggest that instead of saying

'please submit them for their consideration to the United Nations', why don't you say, 'you submit them for information'. Consideration has lot of other implications.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Yes, we will discuss it in flight.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Sir, what is this? He is trivialising the issue.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Sir, I am not trivialising...(Interruptions).

Shrimati Brinda Karat: He has not answered the question on international monitoring...(Interruptions).

Shri S.S. Ahluwalia: Sir, he is responding to the questions raised by the Members of Parliament. And, now he is answering, "we will discuss it in flight". It is not a personal affair that they will discuss it in flight. Is he taking the whole House by flight? When he is answering it, he should answer it properly. He should address the Chair, and through the Chair, he should inform the House.

Shri V. Narayanasamy: Sir, the Minister has replied to all the points.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: Okay, I withdraw the statement. I am trying, but once in a while, ..... Sir, I am trying my best. I am prepared to come tomorrow. I am prepared to come day after tomorrow. I leave on Thursday, and before that, I am prepared to come to this House on as many occasions as you want to address the doubts that you have. I want to re-assure this House that there is simply no compromising on India's national interest. We have a counter draft to the Danish Draft prepared by China, Brazil, South Africa and India. Ours is the BASIC draft. I was in Beijing. I went to Beijing myself. I contributed to the BASIC draft, and we are hoping that the BASIC draft will form the basis of our negotiations. Sir, I am as patriotic and as mindful of the national honour as any other hon. Member...(Interruptions).

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Sir, he has not answered any of the basic questions...(Interruptions).

Mr. Deputy Chairman: He has answered the questions.

Thr Leader of the Opposition (Shri Arun Jaitlay): Sir, the basic doubt we have is that what we are getting from the developed countries. We don't have a single word on this. On the reciprocity principle, the reply merely says, "Yes, we believe in reciprocity." We have not got a single...(Interruptions).

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I am afraid, he has not heard it.

Shri Arun Jaitley: The per capita principle has been completely negated, and we are completely dissatisfied with this reply.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: I have answered every point that the Leader of the Opposition had raised.

Shri Arun Jaitley: We are completely dissatisfied with the reply and we walk out.

Shri Jairam Ramesh: That is pre-planned anyway.

Shrimati Brinda Karat: Sir, we completely disagree with this entire thing...(Interruptions).

(At this stage, some hon. Members left the Chamber)

119. Speech by Minister of Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh on Climate Change at the COP-15.

Copenhagen, December 16, 2009.

Mr. President, Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

It is my privilege to speak on behalf of the Government of India. We continue to derive inspiration from the Father of our nation, Mahatma Gandhi who is an icon for the environmental movement everywhere.

India is already and will be even more profoundly impacted by climate change. In many ways, we have the highest vulnerability on multiple dimensions. We have a tremendous obligation to our own people by way of both adaptation and mitigation policies and programmes. That is why we have already announced a number of ambitious measures proactively.

We have a detailed national action plan on climate change with eight focused national missions and twenty four critical initiatives. Under this plan, we have already launched a solar energy mission aimed at 20,000 Mw by 2022 and a domestic market-based mechanism for further stimulating energy efficiency in industry. Other national missions for accelerating afforestation, for promoting sustainable habitats, for expanding sustainable agriculture and for protecting the crucial Himalayan ecosystem are on the anvil. New GHG emission-reducing technologies in coal-based power generation are being deployed on a large-scale. Mandatory fuel efficiency standards in the transport sector will soon become a reality.

We have established our own version of an IPCC comprising more than 120 of our leading scientific and technological institutions to continuously measure, monitor and model the impacts of climate change on different sectors and in different regions of our country. In addition to establishing a nation-wide climate observatory network, we are going to launch our own satellite in 2011 to monitor GHG and aerosol emissions globally.

Derived from our detailed National Action Plan on Climate Change, we are now considering nationally accountable mitigation outcomes in different sectors like industry, energy, transport, building and forests. Over the last decade we have added over 3 million hectares to our forest cover and today our forest cover is sequestering close to 10% of our annual greenhouse gas emissions. We will endeavour to maintain that level.

India has been a major participant in the CDM. If all our projects are approved and implemented as scheduled by 2012, carbon credits amounting to a further 10% of our annual GHG emissions will be available to developed countries to enable them to meet their KP commitments.

We are convinced that a low-carbon strategy is an essential aspect of sustainable development. While we already have one of the lowest emissions intensity of the economy, we will do more. We are targeting a further emissions intensity decline of 20-25% by 2020 on 2005 levels. This is significant given our huge developmental imperatives.

Deeply conscious of our international responsibilities as well, we have already declared that our per capita emissions will never exceed the per capita emissions of the developed countries. We have recently unveiled projected GHG emissions profiles till the year 2030.

Aware of the need for enhanced transparency, we have suggested using the National Communication process, in a format and frequency to be agreed to, as a mechanism to reflect internationally the nature and impact of actions taken domestically. Let me add here that India has probably the most rigorous MRV system that any government can go through - with its democratic Parliament, activist judiciary, vigilant NGOs and watchful media.

We are transforming environmental governance systems. A judicial National Green Tribunal and an executive National Environmental Protection Agency is on the anvil. We have just announced a new generation of national ambient air quality standards that is on par with the strictest in the world.

Our entire approach to this Conference is anchored in the sanctity of the troika--the UNFCCC, the Kyoto Protocol and the Bali Action Plan. We believe that the well-known and widely accepted principles of (i) common but differentiated responsibility; and (ii) historical responsibilities are sacrosanct.

As a global goal, India subscribes to the view that the temperature increase ought not to exceed 2 degrees Celsius by 2050 from mid-19th century levels. But this objective must be firmly embedded in a demonstrably equitable access to atmospheric space, with adequate finance and technology available to all developing countries.

Excellencies, one of the two heads of state to address the first UN Conference on the Environment held in Stockholm thirty seven years back was Mrs. Indira Gandhi - the other being the host Prime Minister. What she said on the historic occasion brought the development agenda into the mainstream of the discourse on environmental concerns. We recall that message and reiterate our resolve to be integral part of the solution to global warming-now and always."

120. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh Prior to his Departure for Copenhagen to attend the Summit of World Leaders on climate change.

New Delhi, December 17, 2009.

"I am leaving today to attend the 15th Conference of Parties of the United Nations Framework Conference on Climate Change in Copenhagen (UNFCCC).

The UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol embody the international agreed regime for addressing the global challenge of climate change. The UNFCCC is founded on the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. At the 13th Conference of Parties in Bali, the Parties had agreed to launch an Action Plan to enhance the implementation of the UNFCCC. The Bali Action Plan seeks to ensure full, effective and sustained implementation of the UNFCCC through long term cooperative action of the Parties upto and beyond 2012.

It is India's view that global warming is taking place and taking place here and now and its adverse consequences will impact most heavily on developing countries like India. As a responsible member of the international community, India is therefore fully committed to working with the rest of the world to preserve and protect our environment. This is our common heritage, and this is what we must bequeath to our succeeding generations.

At the same time, climate change cannot be addressed by perpetuating the poverty of the developing countries. Every citizen of the globe has equal entitlement of the global atmospheric space. It is in keeping with this principle that I had earlier announced in Heiligendamm in 2007 that we will maintain our per capita emissions at a level lower than the average per capita emissions of developed countries.

We have, as a responsible member of the international community, announced that we will reduce the emissions intensity of our growth by 20-25% in 2020 as compared to 2005. India has also launched a comprehensive Action Plan on Climate Change and the eight National Missions have been set up. We are willing to do more provided there are credible arrangements to provide both additional financial support as well as technological transfers from developed to developing countries.

I look forward to constructive deliberations in Copenhagen which meet the collective aspirations of all humankind and enable us to move forward in the global efforts to combat climate change."

121. DRAFT RESOLUTION BY THE GROUP OF 77 AND CHINA*Capacity-building for Developing Countries*The Conference of the Parties,

Recalling Articles 4.1, 4.3, 4.5, and 4.7, taken within the context of Article 3, and also Articles 5 (c) and (b) of the Convention;

Recalling further the provisions for capacity-building for developing countries contained in Decision 7/CP.4 (Work Programme on Mechanisms of the Kyoto Protocol); Decisions 10/CP.2 and 12/CP.4 (National Communications of non-Annex I Parties); Decisions 9/CP.3 and 4/CP.4 (Development and Transfer of Technologies); Decision 5/CP.4 (Implementation of Article 4.8 and 4.9 of the Convention); Decision 6/CP.4 (Activities Implemented Jointly under the pilot phase); Decision 14/CP.4 (Research and Systematic Observation); and Decisions 11/CP.2 and 2/CP.4 (on Guidance to the Global Environment Facility);

Underlining that capacity-building is for and by developing countries, and activities for capacity-building are to be undertaken in developing countries, within the context of the FCCC, and under the guidance of the intergovernmental process of the Convention;

Recognising that the developing countries, in particular the least-developed countries and the small island developing states amongst them, because of their vulnerability to the adverse effects of climate change and exposure to natural disasters, require special capacity-building initiatives;

Recognising further that the main constraints to capacity-building in developing countries, in particular the least-developed countries and small island developing states amongst them, include lack of access to necessary technologies and know-how, including information technology, lack of appropriate institutions, the lack of financial resources, including for participation in meetings, workshops and seminars, and lack of a regular forum for exchange of information and development of positions among developing countries;

Emphasising that capacity-building, including education, training, public awareness and research are pre-requisites for the meaningful participation of developing countries in the FCCC and the Kyoto Protocol processes, which participation should require the cooperation of the public and private sectors, civil society, relevant financial institutions and development partners;

Emphasising further that capacity-building is a continuous process to be undertaken at all levels, including long-term planning, and aiming at strengthening relevant institutions such as FCCC national focal points or national authorities designated to handle climate change activities, universities, sub-regional and regional institutions, as well as human resources development, in order to provide a critical mass of specialists in all areas relating to the implementation of the Convention;

Decides,

1. To conduct capacity-building activities for the implementation of the Convention in accordance with the provisions of this decision, and the prioritised capacity-building needs for developing country Parties, contained in the Annex to this decision;
2. To provide the necessary financial and technical support to strengthen UNFCCC national focal points or national authorities designated to handle climate change, including training, exchange programmes and equipment;
3. To support national activities to develop and promote climate-related research and studies for the implementation of the FCCC through;
  - the development and strengthening of national centres of excellence;
  - assistance to these centres to enable them provide information on climate change with the use of information technology;
  - the identification of developing country institutions that can undertake activities at sub-regional, regional and international levels; and
  - support for the networking of these developing institutions among themselves, and between them and relevant institutions in developed country Parties;
4. to promote capacity-building of national institutions and expertise through:
  - the use of national experts or consultants to undertake studies, design, and implementation of projects at national level;
  - the setting-up of collaborating centres on climate change-related activities in developing countries at sub-regional or regional levels, and to use these centres to promote national capacity-building; and
  - training, seminars and exchange programmes for the personnel of developing country institutions, in relevant institutions in other developing countries or in developed countries; and

5. to ensure that workshops for capacity-building are undertaken with the participation of developing country Parties concerned, including the approval of the programmes, the presentation of technical papers, and the drawing up of conclusions.
6. To request the Chairman of the Subsidiary Body for Implementation (SBI) and the Chairman of the Subsidiary Body for Scientific and Technological Advise (SBSTA):
  - (a) to examine the conformity of capacity-building activities undertaken under the Convention with the provisions contained in this decision; and
  - (b) to consider capacity-building for the implementation of the Convention as a regular item in its agenda;
7. To request the Secretariat:
  - (a) to prepare, for the consideration of the subsidiary bodies at their 12th sessions, a plan to facilitate capacity-building activities for developing countries under this Convention, taking into account the prioritised list of needs contained in the Annex to this decision;
  - (b) to continue to coordinate with the Secretariats of relevant UN agencies and international organisations, and bilateral and multilateral institutions on their climate change capacity-building activities in support of the implementation of the Convention, and to report on this coordination, including information on the financing of these activities; and
  - (c) to report on the implementation of the provisions of this decision on a regular basis.

122. Speech by Minister of State for Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh at the High Level Segment of the UN Climate Change Conference.

Copenhagen, December 16, 2009.

Mr. President, Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

123. Press Conference of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on Prime Minister's visit to Copenhagen for Conference of Parties -15 meeting.

New Delhi, December 16, 2009.

Official Spokesperson (Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and nice to see you in numbers. As you are aware, Prime Minister of India would be leaving for Copenhagen tomorrow to attend COP15 Summit. Foreign Secretary is here to brief you about Prime Minister's visit. After her Opening Remarks, she will be happy to take a few questions. Madam, the floor is yours.

Foreign Secretary (Smt. Nirupama Rao) - Thank you, Vishnu. Good Afternoon.

The Prime Minister would be visiting Copenhagen from 17-18 December. As you are aware, the Conference of Parties (COP-15) to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) started in Copenhagen on 7 December and would conclude on 18 December 2009.

2. The Copenhagen Conference is not a Summit-level meeting on Climate Change. The Danish Prime Minister has invited Heads of State/Government to the concluding days of the Conference on 17-18 December 2009. The exact format of the Heads of State/Government level session on December 18 is still evolving. However, a formal plenary session with country statements is not expected. We understand that the Danish hosts would provide for a more interactive session.

3. Prime Minister's participation at the Copenhagen Conference demonstrates how seriously India views the challenge of climate change and importance that we attached to intensifying international cooperation to address it.

4. At Copenhagen, the Parties are expected to conclude the process of negotiations launched under the Bali Action Plan (BAP) by the 13th Conference of Parties (COP-13) in December 2007 and reach an agreed outcome of all elements of the BAP. At the same time, the Conference of Parties serving as the meeting of Parties to Kyoto Protocol (KP) has to decide on the quantified emission to KP on the second commitment period beginning 2013.

5. From the current state of negotiations, it appears that the developed countries are not prepared for a comprehensive outcome at Copenhagen that would bind them to fulfill the commitments for emissions reductions under Kyoto protocol and the UNFCCC. It appears that the CoP 15 Chair is working towards a political agreement, and not a legally binding agreement, that would cover immediate and strong action on all areas of the Bali mandate that would set the Parties on track for a comprehensive legal framework (in due course) during 2010.

6. From our perspective, we need to ensure that this expression of a fresh political commitment does not become a template for a new mandate that detracts from the Bali Action Plan and dissolves the fundamental differentiation in the nature of commitments/actions amongst developed and developing countries as visualized in the BAP.

7. India is working in the BASIC coalition, with Brazil, South Africa and China. We are also in close touch with our friends in Africa. The G-77 and China, as the largest grouping of developing countries is performing an extremely useful role in helping member states coordinate their approach to climate change negotiations, although there are groups within the G-77 with a very specific perspective, such as the small island states.

8. A key objective for India and its coalition partners is to ensure that any further work in the post- Copenhagen phase of negotiations proceeds on the basis of the principles and provisions of the UN Convention, and the Bali Action Plan. As you are probably aware, a conference in Mexico, to be held sometime in the second half of 2010, has been mooted in this connection.

Question: Madam, about Headley and Rana. The point is that Headley was clearly here in India sometime ago. He had applied for a visa in Chicago and it appears that the visa application papers and photographs and things seem to be misplaced or missing. Can you tell us a little about it?

Foreign Secretary: I am aware of the report, on the issue that you just raised. I want to tell you that I have sought a factual report from our Consul General in Chicago in this regard.

Question: My question is on climate change. What is the Indian Prime Minister carrying to Copenhagen and what are India's expectations from the Summit? Is there a proposal that India is going to table at the talks there and what are the country's expectations from these talks?

Foreign Secretary: As you know, our negotiators are already in Copenhagen and our Minister for Environment and Forests has been there for the last few days. What we want, and we have stressed this all along, is an effective and equitable outcome at Copenhagen and we are playing a constructive role in these negotiations. We have stressed that developed countries need to come up with ambitious emission reduction numbers. This is at the heart of the outcome at Copenhagen and will be critical to its success. The numbers put on the table so far, unfortunately, are disappointing.

Question: Headley has been here five times before 26/11 and once in March this year. Now that it has come out in the open that Headley has been working as a double agent, as an informer of DEA as well as working for Lashkar-e-Tayyiba, what is the Government of India going to do in this case? Has the Government of India approached the US at least for having access to him? I believe that it was done some months back and it has been denied. Are we going to approach the US authorities once again in that matter? And what about Rana?

Foreign Secretary: Rajiv, these investigations are ongoing. Obviously there is a case that is under way and you cannot expect me to divulge the details of the investigations in the media. That is the first point that I want to establish. I want to emphasise that we are getting very good cooperation from the United States' Government in this regard on the case that you have referred to, and our concerned agencies are in touch with each other. What the US Government has told us is that at all levels they will cooperate with us in the investigations into this case.

Question: I have a question again about climate change. The Alliance of Small Island States (AOSIS) has apparently taken a position that is somewhat different to the original G77 plus China position that hoped for a consensus. The Danish are apparently backing the AOSIS on a slightly different tack thereon. What exactly is the BASIC position vis-a-vis the AOSIS in this? Has there been a commonality or has there been a bridging of the gap between the two?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously we would like a bridging of the gap and we would like full harmonisation of positions among developing countries. That is what the BASIC group - our coalition of the countries that I mentioned, South Africa, Brazil, China and India - are working with the G77 to achieve. We are trying to achieve a harmonisation of positions. Of course, we have understood that the Small Island Developing States, the least developed countries, have certain valid concerns about the effect of climate change on their future, on their development. But the issue at the heart of this Conference and at the heart of the debate on climate change is really how we protect and how we advance the cause of sustainable development, poverty eradication, energy security, and basically the cause of all of us in the developing world.

Question: The way things are going at Copenhagen, it looks like there may not be an agreed draft on the table when the Heads of Government and Heads of State meet. Our Minister had said very clearly that our Prime Minister would not be going to Copenhagen to negotiate on the fine print. So, where do things stand? The last thing I read was that everybody is hoping that when Obama comes the whole dynamics will change and that is when the real negotiations will begin. So, where do we stand on this, Madam?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously I cannot predict what the outcome would be. It has been a complex set of negotiations in Copenhagen and the entire world has seen that happening in living colour. But what we want to ensure from India's side - and I believe this is shared by our coalition partners in BASIC and G77 - is that the whole template of these negotiations should not be shifted, should not mutate in a manner that does not serve the cause that we have fought so long for. That is really at the heart of this. I just mentioned it also. On the issues of mitigation, adaptation, technology, finance, all that we need in the developing world is to advance our defences against climate change and at the same time promote our development. That is at the core of what we are doing.

Question: How optimistic are you that some kind of a draft will be ready before they arrive?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think it would be appropriate for me to say that I am optimistic or I am hopeful at this stage. I am realistic about the complexities of the negotiations involved. But that does not mean we should give up our struggle or that we should give up the fight. We are determined to push the case that we have fought for all this time, and to ensure that those issues that are non-negotiable from our side are not in any way compromised.

Question: Madam, are any bilateral meetings planned, say with Chinese Premier or a pull aside with President Obama? And what is the kind of financial support we are looking for from developed world? Can you give us a precise figure over which some negotiations are going on?

Foreign Secretary: I cannot give you a precise figure over which negotiations are on. A number of suggestions have been put forward.

Especially at the Commonwealth Summit you had Prime Minister Gordon Brown speak of a fast-start fund, and some new figures have been put forward during the negotiations at Copenhagen. So, I do not want to start speculating on what a ballpark figure would be. Suffice it to say that we need sufficient finance and we need the right technology to deal with the issues relating to mitigation of climate change factors and dealing with adaptation, from the technological point of view, to have more clean energy, to be more energy-efficient but at the same time preserving the goals of sustainable development. As far as bilateral meetings are involved, no bilateral meetings as of now.

Question: Not even a meeting with Premier Wen Jiabao?

Foreign Secretary: Nothing on the cards as of now. I emphasise 'as of now'.

Question: Madam, the way talks have progressed with China including Prime Minister's talks with the Chinese Premier, what will be India strategy in the light of talks with the developing countries and the walk outs at Copenhagen? What type of deal will materialize? Secondly on the Headley front, Was he a double agent? You have not clearly stated whether he was a double agent and whether India knew about it? (free translation from the Hindi text)

Foreign Secretary: I do not want to comment on the fact whether he was a double agent? This is an ongoing investigation and I do not think it would be professional for me to be telling the media whether he was or is or was not a double agent. I am sorry; I will not be able to comment on that. And on the issue of what we want from Copenhagen, I have emphasised it that our attitude is balanced, it's constructive. But we want an equitable outcome and we want to work to preserve our basic concerns. We will not be able to negotiate on certain issues which are of core concern to us obviously. You must, of course, be aware of what these non-negotiable issues are but I will repeat them for you. Basically we will not accept a legally-binding emission reduction cut. We will not, under any circumstances, accept an agreement which stipulates a peaking order for our emissions. And the voluntary mitigation actions financed from our own domestic resources will not be subject to international monitoring or measuring, review or verification.

Question: Foreign Secretary, what are the chances of a political statement out of Copenhagen being a disappointment to India and to the G77? And if it is just a political statement alone and not any legally-binding measures, would you judge this as success or failure?

Foreign Secretary: Well it certainly would not measure up to our expectations, if that were to happen. But it does not mean that we will give up the fight or give up the struggle. Obviously there is life beyond Copenhagen. We have to focus on the post-Copenhagen phase of negotiations obviously. What we want to ensure is that the principles or provisions of the UN Convention and the Bali Action Plan should continue to be adhered to.

Question: Madam, how hopeful are you to have a legally-binding agreement in Mexico in the next conference?

Foreign Secretary: I think that is looking very far ahead but we are eternally hopeful, let me say that.

Question: Madam, when Prime Minister went to US we read a report that within ten or twelve days there would be a final deal, that the 123 Agreement will reach the next stage. Why is it delayed? On the issue of Headley and Rana, Madam, we understand your saying that you do not want to comment. But so many announcements have been made that India and US are having a good joint cooperation on counter terrorism and all such issues. In view of that, one understands that there is an anti-climax on diplomacy of counter terrorism between India and the US.

Foreign Secretary: No, I would not agree with that sort of label being put on the cooperation that we are now engaged in on this particular case and in general in counter terrorism cooperation with the United States. What I am saying is that these issues by their very nature should not be discussed through the media when there is an ongoing investigation. This is a case involving national security. It is a case involving the activities of individuals engaged in actions detrimental to our security, engaged in terrorist plots and conspiracies. Obviously, it is a very sensitive matter. I think it would be in the interest of our people and of our country not to be discussing these details through the media. You and I are both citizens of this country and I am sure you will understand what I mean.

Question: In fact, we are upset about this.

Foreign Secretary: We are upset naturally. We have seen the way details of the case have come out and obviously there is a lot of cause for concern about the activities that were believed to have been carried out by these two individuals. There is certainly definite cause for serious concern and we attach the highest importance to the unravelling of this conspiracy properly, to the completion of these investigations and obviously for us to have full access to the investigation, the information that is coming out of these investigations. The investigating agency on the American side and our concerned agencies are in close touch. I want to tell you that 24/7 they are in close touch.

To answer your other question, the next round of talks has not been scheduled as yet. It will be done shortly. We hope to finalise the agreement at the earliest - I am talking about the agreement on arrangements and procedures - and it will certainly be within the timelines of the bilateral agreement on civil nuclear energy. The agreement basically provides for these talks to conclude within one year, basically before July 2010.

Question: Foreign Secretary, India has accepted legally-binding treaties in the past. What exactly is our problem in accepting one at Copenhagen now?

Foreign Secretary: I am talking of legally-binding emissions. Obviously, you cannot be subject to a legally-binding control on your emissions at this stage of your development. What we have said is we are taking our national actions for mitigation. We are perfectly transparent about these actions. We are communicating the details to the United Nations and to the multilateral bodies, and we will continue to do that. But we are not going to accept externally induced or externally imposed legal levels on our emissions at this stage. It is a question of the finance, the technology that the developed world is prepared to provide so that we can undertake all the mitigation actions that we are required to do, that we will need to do. We are not denying the fact that we need to be sensitive to the issues of climate change because it affects us all. It is not that this is some distant drama that is taking place well away from our shores. It is happening to us here and now. Already our National Action Plan on Climate Change elaborates the importance that we attach, the policies that we are putting in place to deal with climate change. Domestically we have very far-reaching and ambitious programmes designed to enhance energy efficiency of the economy, diversifying our fuel mix which will help us lower the growth of our greenhouse gas emissions. In fact, our emissions intensity, as our Minister announced in Parliament, will decrease by 20 to 25 per cent according to the calculations, very scientific calculations by the Planning Commission experts, by 2020 over 2005 as a result of these domestic actions, which are voluntary and based on our own financial and technological resources. But we cannot accept a peaking period on our emissions under any circumstances as this denies us the legitimate space for our social and our economic development and it would constrain our efforts for eradication of poverty.

Question: This is even if we get the technology and the finances. Is that the position?

Foreign Secretary: No, at this stage of our development it will not be possible for us to accept legally-binding emission reduction targets.

Question: Madam, I wish to understand one point. We know all what India has said is non-negotiable. We also understand what Denmark and Australia have said. What therefore appears is that there shall be little progress at Copenhagen Summit. Will that be good for India? (free translation from Hindi text)

Foreign Secretary: I know this question has been asked before. It is not that we are naysayers or that India is a country that is saying no. But India is a country that will stand up to protect and safeguard its interests. I think there is virtue in that position. And I believe our developing country partners are solidly with us on this. It is not a question of just one country against the rest of the world. We have a huge proportion of developing countries working together on this.

Question: Mrs. Rao, I just want a clarification on an earlier comment which was made on information on the Headley-Rana investigation. You said India wants full access to the information. Would we be happy with access just to the documents? Or are we still seeking access to the two individuals as well?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously at some stage we would want access to the two individuals. We are not denying that. The investigations are ongoing. Information is being shared with us and we are happy with the cooperation that we are receiving from the American side on this issue.

Question: Mrs. Rao, this is regarding the ULFA Chief Paresh Baruah. Any information of his presence in Myanmar? And what kind of cooperation do we seek in getting him back to the country?

Foreign Secretary: As you know, our External Affairs Minister was recently in Myanmar in the context of the BIMSTEC Summit. During this visit he met with the leadership of Myanmar and had useful discussions on various issues of mutual interest with them. On the question of security cooperation and the presence of Indian insurgent groups in Myanmar, this is an issue we have consistently taken up with the Myanmar side, and they in turn have assured us that they would not let their territory to be used for anti-India activities. There is no confirmation about the presence of Paresh Bauah in Myanmar. But we will continue to take whatever steps necessary to see that our security interests are addressed.

Question: Madam, there is this treaty that India is going to sign with Bangladesh, at least an agreement, about prisoners. Supposing an Indian prisoner is held in Bangladesh, he is going to be returned. I think it is coming in the Cabinet today. Will this relate to the ULFA people because they may have been tried and found guilty in India? Will that apply then?

Question: I have a related question. The Bangladesh Prime Minister was supposed to be coming over the next couple of days. I believe that visit has been deferred for a while. Are there any new dates for that? And why was it deferred?

Foreign Secretary: I want to tell you that Her Excellency the Prime Minister of Bangladesh has been invited to visit India. We are looking forward to that visit. The visit is very likely to take place in the second week of January 2010. Since both Prime Ministers are visiting Copenhagen for the climate change meeting, they mutually decided that we should postpone the visit till after the Copenhagen Summit. That is the reason why we have decided to have it in January. As far as the issue of security cooperation is concerned, I will deal with it in the general context with Bangladesh, I want to say that this is an ongoing issue and we are happy about the level of cooperation that exists between both countries in order to deal with antisocial elements, terrorists, insurgents. Obviously during the forthcoming visit of the Prime Minister of Bangladesh we will have the opportunity not only to discuss these issues further but to consolidate the level of cooperation in this regard.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

124. Prime Minister's Statement Prior to his Departure for Copenhagen.

New Delhi December 17, 2009.

"I am leaving today to attend the 15th Conference of Parties of the United Nations Framework Conference on Climate Change in Copenhagen (UNFCCC).

The UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol embody the international agreed regime for addressing the global challenge of climate change. The UNFCCC is founded on the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. At the 13th Conference of Parties in Bali, the Parties had agreed to launch an Action Plan to enhance the implementation of the UNFCCC. The Bali Action Plan seeks to ensure full, effective and sustained implementation of the UNFCCC through long term cooperative action of the Parties upto and beyond 2012.

It is India's view that global warming is taking place and taking place here and now and its adverse consequences will impact most heavily on developing countries like India. As a responsible member of the international community, India is therefore fully committed to working with the rest of the world to preserve and protect our environment. This is our common heritage, and this is what we must bequeath to our succeeding generations.

At the same time, climate change cannot be addressed by perpetuating the poverty of the developing countries. Every citizen of the globe has equal entitlement of the global atmospheric space. It is in keeping with this principle that I had earlier announced in Heiligendamm in 2007 that we will maintain our per capita emissions at a level lower than the average per capita emissions of developed countries.

We have, as a responsible member of the international community, announced that we will reduce the emissions intensity of our growth by 20-25% in 2020 as compared to 2005. India has also launched a comprehensive Action Plan on Climate Change and the eight National Missions have been set up. We are willing to do more provided there are credible arrangements to provide both additional financial support as well as technological transfers from developed to developing countries.

I look forward to constructive deliberations in Copenhagen which meet the collective aspirations of all humankind and enable us to move forward in the global efforts to combat climate change."

Copenhagen, December 18, 2009.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I would like to thank Prime Minister Rasmussen for his efforts in trying to build a global consensus on highly complex issues, involved in climate change, attempting to balance divergent and varied interests.

We have all worked hard to reconcile our different points of view. The outcome may well fall short of expectations. Nevertheless, it can become a significant milestone. I therefore support calls for subsequent negotiations towards building a truly global and genuinely collaborative response to climate change being concluded during 2010.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

As we embark on future negotiations, we would do well to take stock of what we have learnt from our efforts over the past two years. I draw three lessons, which should guide us in the task ahead.

Firstly, the vast majority of countries do not support any renegotiation or dilution of the principles and provisions of the UNFCCC, in particular the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

Further, the need for action on our part is more and not less than what was envisaged at the time of the Rio Convention or the Kyoto Protocol. That is why the Bali Action Plan commits us to enhancing the implementation of the UNFCCC.

To settle for something that would be seen as diminished expectations and diminished implementation would be the wrong message to emerge from this Conference. We should therefore reaffirm categorically that our negotiations will continue on the basis of the Bali mandate.

Secondly, the Kyoto Protocol should continue to stand as a valid legal instrument. Parties to the Protocol should deliver on their solemn commitments under the Protocol. It would go against international public opinion if we acquiesce in its replacement by a new and weaker set of commitments.

Finally, it is clear that any agreement on climate change should respect the need for development and growth in developing countries. Equitable burden sharing should underlie any effective global climate change regime. Any new regime will have moral authority and credibility only if it acknowledges that every citizen of the globe has an equal entitlement to the global atmospheric space.

India has a vital stake in the success of the negotiations as we are among the countries most likely to be severely impacted by climate change.

We have therefore adopted and started to implement a major National Action Plan on Climate Change, relying upon our own resources. Our targets include installation of 20,000 MW of solar energy capacity by 2022, improving energy efficiency by 20% by 2020 and adding an additional 6 million hectares of forests over the next several years.

Excellencies, each one of us gathered here today acknowledges that those worst affected by climate change are the least responsible for it. Whatever emerges from our negotiations must address this glaring injustice, injustice to countries of Africa, injustice to the Least Developed Countries, and injustice to the Small Developing States whose very survival as viable nation states is in jeopardy. We in India, too, are vulnerable, but nevertheless as responsible citizens of the globe, we have agreed to take on a voluntary target of reducing the emission intensity of our GDP growth by around 20% by 2020 in comparison to 2005. We will deliver on this goal regardless of the outcome of this Conference. We can do even more if a supportive global climate change regime is put in place.

Excellencies, we have a difficult task ahead of us. I hope we will all play a positive and constructive role so that we can bridge differences and come up with a balanced and also an equitable outcome during the coming year. India will not be found wanting in this regard.

Thank you.

126. Press Conference by Foreign Secretary and Special Envoy of Prime Minister on sidelines of COP15.

Copenhagen, December 18, 2009.

Media Adviser to PM (Mr. Khare): Good afternoon. Welcome to this press briefing by Mr. Shyam Saran, Special Envoy of the Prime Minister on Climate Change; and Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao. They will give a brief overview and then will take a few questions.

Foreign Secretary (Mrs. Nirupama Rao): Thank you, Mr. Khare.

Before I invite the Special Envoy of the Prime Minister on Climate Change to brief you on the negotiations at the proceedings this morning, I would just like to give a brief overview of developments.

As we know, the BASIC countries - Brazil, South Africa, India and China - and the G77 including many African countries have been working together to ensure a balanced and equitable outcome to this Climate Change Conference and those efforts have continued over the last few days and into today. This morning, the leaders of these countries had an informal discussion on the sidelines of the Conference. During those discussions it was very clear that their resolve to work together to ensure that balanced and equitable outcome in a manner that would protect the interests of sustainable development and poverty eradication was very strong and determined. That in itself was an indication of the strength and the determination with which these countries are approaching the deliberations.

Our Prime Minister had a meeting with Premier Wen Jiabao of China this morning at 8:30. It was a meeting that lasted about half an hour. This was a meeting at the delegation level between the two countries also, led by the two Prime Ministers. Prime Minister Wen of China stressed that the understanding, the support and cooperation that existed between India and China in these discussions on climate change at the Conference, was very much reflective of the friendship not only between the leaders of the two countries but also between the countries themselves. He stressed the need to build consensus among the developing countries and he was very appreciative of the tremendous efforts that India has made in tackling climate change. He spoke of the importance of focussing on the draft text that was being discussed at these deliberations, about the emission reduction targets that had been discussed, on the MRV review, and on the issue of finance. As you know, there are two texts on the table - my colleague will elaborate on that later - and the Prime Minister stressed that these two texts should form the basis of an outcome for this Conference.

Both leaders agreed that we should not in any way alter the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities, and that the developed countries had certain obligations in this regard that they must fulfil. They both agreed that without unity, without cooperation, without continuous consultation between India and China and the other countries within BASIC, the success of the Conference could not be assured, that such cooperation was essential, was crucial to the success of our deliberations, and indeed without unity, and cooperation between India and China we could not have an Asian century.

There was also a brief discussion on bilateral relations. Both leaders stressed the importance of our bilateral cooperation, our continuing dialogue to resolve outstanding issues between the two countries. As has already been reported by some sections of the media, Premier Wen made a reference to the Joint Statement issued between China and the United States following the visit of President Barack Obama to China recently. He said that the formulation in a certain section of that Joint Statement relating to South Asia was not directed or targeted at India, that China respects India and would like to pursue relations with India on the basis of equality, that it did not have any intention to interfere in the affairs of our region, that it wanted solidarity and prosperity among all the countries concerned, and that there should be no misunderstanding between the two countries in this regard.

Prime Minister, in turn, reiterated that we would like to work to strengthen our friendship with China in every possible way. He appreciated what Premier Wen had told him about the US-China Statement. He said that the people of India wanted good relations with China, and that pending the resolution of outstanding issues between the two countries we should maintain peace and tranquillity in our border areas. He also agreed that without the sustained development of India and China in the 21st century that century could not be an Asian century, and that our relationship is a powerful factor for peace and prosperity in Asia and the world as a whole.

Prime Minister said that we were very happy that there is good cooperation in this current Conference among the BASIC countries and between India and China as part of this, and we need to work continuously and consult continuously with each other to ensure that our goals in regard to dealing with the challenge of climate change are met satisfactorily and comprehensively.

I would now invite Mr. Shyam Saran, our Special Envoy, to speak.

Special Envoy to Prime Minister on Climate Change (Shri Shyam Saran):
Let me just pick up from where Nirupama has left off.

Following this meeting in the morning between the Prime Minister's of China and India, just before the plenary session began this morning, there was also a meeting on the sidelines amongst the BASIC countries, i.e., India, China, Brazil and South Africa. This meeting was a very important one because these four countries have very common perceptions with regard to what is the nature of the outcome which should come out from this Conference, what are the key principles which in a sense are redlines for these four countries and for most developing countries, and what could be the way forward.

One of the very important points which were stressed was that there needs to be a transparent and an inclusive process. That is, whatever is going to emerge from this Conference must be something which is truly the result of a multilateral process. So, it was agreed that whatever be the outcome, that outcome must follow the normal process of the Conference of Parties. As you know, we have two documents already with us. One is the Report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Kyoto Protocol and we also have a Report of the Chairman of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Long-Term Cooperative Action which is essentially the elaboration of the Bali Action Plan. Now it is true that those two documents have a number of brackets. There are areas where we have convergence, there are areas where we do not have convergence. There are still outstanding issues. So, the normal process would be for the Chairmen to perhaps have some kind of a general statement which would recognise the work that has been done so far and set the stage for subsequent negotiations in 2010.

There is an effort at this point of time to try and agree upon some kind of a declaratory statement - a three-page or a four-page statement - which would have basically some broad propositions reflecting where we have agreed, for example, to engage in technological cooperation. As you know, some offers have been made with respect to both a fast-start fund for the next three years. There have also been references made to perhaps a medium-term fund for 2020. So, there are several issues of this kind where there is a degree of convergence. So, a statement that could reflect that and also list out what are the outstanding issues on which we need to work further.

What the four BASIC countries stressed is that this particular process of coming out with any kind of Conference outcome document must be a transparent process, must be an inclusive process. They also agreed that it is not the job of the Heads of State and Government to actually engage in textual negotiations. That is not their job. And that should not be something that we would welcome that if a document is produced at the last moment which then we are asked to adopt, this would not be possible. We would need to go through the normal process of examining the document, looking at the various propositions which may be there. It could be one of the things which could be considered in the subsequent negotiations, but this is not the manner in which we can ensure a successful outcome.

Amongst the specific issues I would like to pick on three or four points which were also reflected in the speeches made by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh himself. I think the text of that statement will be circulated to you shortly. But it was also a theme which was there in the statement made by the Prime Minister of China, the President of Brazil. One point is that we must be sure that the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change is not in any manner diluted; its principles and provisions must be reaffirmed. So, we are not negotiating a new treaty. So, we must remain within the parameters of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. This is something on which all the four countries are entirely agreed.

Second point is that whatever be the nature of negotiations that we carry on in the post-Copenhagen period, those negotiations must be in accordance with the mandate of the Bali Action Plan, that it cannot be at a diminished level, it cannot be with diminished expectations. Yes, we recognise that there are certain outstanding issues which remain to be addressed. But in addressing those issues, the mandate must be the Bali mandate. This is a very key point and this is also something which the four countries I mentioned are entirely agreed upon.

The third point, which is also very important, is what happens to the Kyoto Protocol? Here again these four countries have an unambiguous position on this that the Kyoto Protocol is a legally valid instrument and this instrument must remain effective, operative as we take this process forward post-Copenhagen. These are some key elements on which there is a meeting of minds.

You may have heard about the issue of MRV and how is this principle going to be applied. Here again these four countries have taken the position that as far as those actions for which we are seeking financial support, for which we are seeking technological transfer, certainly we have no difficulty in accepting any kind of international scrutiny, any kind of accountability. But when it comes to actions which we take domestically, voluntarily, with our own resources, those kinds of actions cannot be subjected to the same MRV process. However, we have no difficulty in being transparent about what we are doing and, therefore, we have no difficulty in having an arrangement through which we can reflect these actions to the international community, to the UN Framework Convention, as information. But this is not something which is subject to any kind of scrutiny. This is something again which the four countries who had a meeting on the sidelines were entirely agreed upon.

The Prime Minister, as I mentioned to you, made a statement just about half an hour ago in which he, of course, expressed a degree of disappointment that the outcome which may emerge - because the outcome is still to emerge - may not correspond to international expectations, may not correspond to the comprehensive, balanced, equitable outcome that we have all been looking for. But it is still possible. If it is handled properly, if it is an inclusive document, if it is something which all of us have put our stamp of approval on, this can still be a significant milestone as we carry these negotiations forward.

Apart from stating those three-four points that I mentioned, he also said that it is extremely important to recognise that climate change action must take into account the priority of development, the priority of poverty eradication for developing countries. He drew attention to the fact that there must be an acknowledgement of the grave injustice which is there - injustice for countries of Africa, injustice for the least-developed countries, injustice to small island developing states, countries which have the least to do, least blameworthy for the phenomena of climate change and yet are the worst-affected. Whatever emerges from this process must address this injustice. This was the very important point that Prime Minister made in his statement.

What I would like to conclude with is that our understanding is that some negotiating process is currently taking place with regard to this document that I mentioned to you which may be something with which the reports of the two Ad Hoc Working Groups will be carried forward for further negotiations. We hope that at some point we will have an agreed document which will enjoy the support of all the 192 countries who are gathered here because it is only on the basis of consensus, it is only on the basis of a truly multilateral, transparent process that we can have an effective basis on which to carry our work forward.

Thank you very much. We would happy to take questions from you.

Question: Has the Government of India been given the document that is to be adopted later? And do you have enough time to go through it and accept it? Would you characterise the Copenhagen meeting as heading for a failure?

Special Envoy: No, I would not say that the Copenhagen meeting is heading for a failure. I do not think we should approach these negotiations with that frame of mind. There is a document which we have seen which was put forward in the early hours of the morning which emerged from the Chairmen of the Conference of Parties. As I mentioned to you, there have been a number of discussions on that particular draft. But in addition there have been also certain alternative drafts which have been put forward. So, the situation has become a little confusing. All that I can really say in all honesty is that that particular process of negotiation is still taking place. This is very much a work in progress. Perhaps later during the day we may be able to give you perhaps some more concrete news concerning these negotiations.

Question: Mr. Shyam Saran, this is again related to the same question. Around 3 o'clock is when the adoption of this so-called political statement is expected to be ...(Inaudible)... on time. It is 1:45 right now. Do you think there is going to be enough time for the Indian Delegation to really go through it and for the negotiators to really approve it by 3 o'clock? Secondly, there is information that Prime Minister Wen Jiabao also discussed some reservations about this umbrella paragraph that would not be in that text and there are some fears that India and China expect from this Conference. What is your deadline of how long you can wait for this draft and how much time you will take to actually okay it?

Special Envoy: I can only say that we still have till the end of the day for the Heads of State and Government to essentially adopt or endorse an outcome document. As I mentioned to you, the Chairmen's reports on those two Ad Hoc Working Groups are already there. Those documents are in any case available. It is a question of what is it that it would be sent with for further negotiations. So, that is basically a kind of an agreed outcome document of a general character. The effort is to try and see whether we can have a document which in a broad way can reflect some of the areas where we have convergent opinions and can also identify some of the outstanding issues on which we will need further work. That is really what we are working on. As I said, all that I am able to really convey to you at this point of time is that this is a work in progress. Our delegation is also very much taking part in those negotiations. We are hopeful that as a result of these negotiations we would be able to come up with some kind of an agreed document. That remains the hope. We will make, as I said, every effort possible to contribute to that outcome document. Premier Wen Jiabao did mention his reservation about some kind of an umbrella document. Essentially he was referring to the fact that last evening there was some kind of a meeting amongst a limited number of Heads of State and Government who talked about what could be the substance of such a document. China was not represented at that particular meeting and, of course, our Prime Minister was also not there because he arrived only late in the evening. So, he was expressing reservation about that essentially because he said such a process needs to be an inclusive process. Such a process, when we are having a multilateral conference, cannot pick and choose which countries will be taking part in the negotiations, which countries will be kept out. That is not the way in which you approach multilateral negotiations.

Let me tell you that the Prime Minister of India in the conversation which took place with Premier Wen Jiabao entirely endorsed this view that this has to be an inclusive process, this has to be a multilateral process. So, let us see what is the outcome of these very intense negotiations which are currently taking place. Hopefully during the day we would be able to convey to you whether or not we have really an outcome document ready for the Heads of State and Government to adopt.

Question: ...(Inaudible)... statement ...(Inaudible)... and have a legally-binding climate ...(Inaudible)... by the year 2010. Coming back to MRV, why on the national actions that you ...(Inaudible)... want to have MRV? Because since ...(Inaudible)... there is some ...(Inaudible)... enhance what you are doing ...(Inaudible)... reducing carbon emission etc., and also I always thought that there is no reason for any developing country not to take sector-based targets of emission reduction ...(Inaudible)...

Special Envoy: Firstly, let me make what I think is a very important point. I think somehow the attention has got shifted to MRV from much a more serious question which is the Kyoto Protocol. Kyoto Protocol has today internationally legally-binding commitments and there is an enforcement mechanism. There are penalties for non-performance. This is what is being rejected. So, what is it being replaced by? It is being replaced by something which is not internationally binding. That means there is no international enforcement procedure. Basically what you are saying is, "Let us pledge something and let us review it". As far as developing countries are concerned, they are saying, "Please do not diminish the level of commitment." It is not we who are saying that you should diminish the level of commitment. This idea of MRV is a bit of a red herring. As far as we are concerned, we have no difficulty. No developing country has any difficulty in accepting international scrutiny, accountability with respect to any action which we take for which there is international support in the form of technology, in the form of financial resources. No difficulty at all. We also do not have any difficulty in reflecting whatever we do voluntarily with our own domestic resources in the form of National Communications to the UNFCCC. There is an international obligation under the UNFCCC already which obliges Parties to the Convention to actually make the international community aware of what they are doing in terms of their climate change action. We are saying, 'We are willing to go much further.' You can make this more frequent, if you wish. You can make it biannual if you wish. You want to make it more detailed?

We have in India no problem with this. In India we have a Parliament. Everything that the Government does has to be reported to Parliament in great detail. The Government has to face tremendous scrutiny on the part of our legislators. We have no problem with transparency. Let us not quibble about this word 'verification'. The real issue here is not verification of actions which have to be taken by developing countries. The real issue here is, there are countries who are trying to get out of what are legally-binding commitments today with an international enforcement mechanism, and instead want to replace it with something which will be much more diluted. That is the issue.

Question: Could you confirm to us who is representing India in the talks right now on that particular document? Is the Indian Government okay if that document does not reflect numbers from the KP? Do you think it is violation of our own idea of transparency because select group of countries is right now negotiating that document and it is not being discussed actually with all the countries, and it will be taken to the rest of the countries later?

Special Envoy: We have a negotiating team here and that negotiating team is led by the Minister of Environment Mr. Jairam Ramesh. That particular team is engaged in these negotiations. As I said, it is a work in progress. So, to the specific issues that you are raising, I am afraid you will have to wait for a little time before we can give you answers because each of these issues is still something which is under negotiation. So, just be a little patient. I think we can forward with answers for you.

Question: I have two quick questions. President Barack Obama has just announced the 100 billion US dollar assistance. How much of it will India actually get in that India welcomed this announcement because there is a stipulation that adds to it? Secondly, Jairam Ramesh yesterday said that there is 75 per cent agreement with the US and 25 per cent disagreement. What is this 25 per cent disagreement?

Special Envoy: The 25 per cent disagreement is with respect to the nature of the reporting and whether or not the report that we make is going to be subject to some kind of an international verification meaning thereby is there going to be some kind of an international team which will come and examine your figures to work out whether it is really accurate or not, which will say is your action adequate in terms of what is required for climate change or it is not adequate. What we are saying is we have no difficulty in reporting what we have been doing; we have no difficulty in reporting this more frequently; we have no difficulty in reporting in more detail. Of course, this is something which will have to be agreed upon amongst all the state parties. But as India, given the fact that we are an open society we have no difficulty with transparency. But I think where there is still a difference of opinion is in terms of this verification part. What does verification really mean? If verification becomes another word for compliance, some kind of an international arrangement for pronouncing a judgment on your action, that is something which we believe is not required under the Convention, not required under the Kyoto Protocol. We have in fact made an important gesture. Even though we do not have any legally-binding obligation to take on mitigation targets, we have voluntarily decided to convey that we are ready to take on an emission reduction target. This is something which we are doing in order to contribute to the success of these negotiations. In any negotiation there is a give and take. If we have taken a step forward, we would also expect our partners to take a step forward towards us.

Media Adviser : Thank you very much. I think we have run out of time. We thank Mr. Shyam Saran and the Foreign Secretary. They have to go back and help the Minister in negotiations. Thank you.

127. Declaration of the Heads of State/Government, Ministers and other Heads of Delegation present at the United Nations Climate Change Conference -2009.

Copenhagen, December 18, 2009.

In pursuit of the ultimate objective of the Convention as stated in its Article 2,

Being guided by the principles and provisions of the Convention,

Noting the results of work done by the two Ad hoc Working Groups,

Endorsing decision x/CP.15 on the Ad hoc Working Group on Long-term Cooperative Action and decision x/CMP.5 that requests the Ad hoc Working Group on Further Commitments of Annex I Parties under the Kyoto Protocol to continue its work,

Have agreed on this Copenhagen Accord which is operational immediately.

1. We underline that climate change is one of the greatest challenges of our time. We emphasise our strong political will to urgently combat climate change in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. To achieve the ultimate objective of the Convention to stabilize greenhouse gas concentration in the atmosphere at a level that would prevent dangerous anthropogenic interference with the climate system, we shall, recognizing the scientific view that the increase in global temperature should be below 2 degrees Celsius, on the basis of equity and in the context of sustainable development, enhance our long-term cooperative action to combat climate change. We recognize the critical impacts of climate change and the potential impacts of response measures on countries particularly vulnerable to its adverse effects and stress the need to establish a comprehensive adaptation programme including international support.

2. We agree that deep cuts in global emissions are required according to science, and as documented by the IPCC Fourth Assessment Report with a view to reduce global emissions so as to hold the increase in global temperature below 2 degrees Celsius, and take action to meet this objective consistent with science and on the basis of equity. We should cooperate in achieving the peaking of global and national emissions as soon as possible, recognizing that the time frame for peaking will be longer in developing countries and bearing in mind that social and economic development and poverty eradication are the first and overriding priorities of developing countries and that a low-emission development strategy is indispensable to sustainable development.

3. Adaptation to the adverse effects of climate change and the potential impacts of response measures is a challenge faced by all countries. Enhanced action and international cooperation on adaptation is urgently required to ensure the implementation of the Convention by enabling and supporting the implementation of adaptation actions aimed at reducing vulnerability and building resilience in developing countries, especially in those that are particularly vulnerable, especially least developed countries, small island developing States and Africa. We agree that developed countries shall provide adequate, predictable and sustainable financial resources, technology and capacity-building to support the implementation of adaptation action in developing countries.

4. Annex I Parties commit to implement individually or jointly the quantified economy-wide emission targets for 2020, to be submitted in the format given in Appendix I by Annex I Parties to the secretariat by 31 January 2010 for compilation in an INF document. Annex I Parties that are Party to the Kyoto Protocol will thereby further strengthen the emissions reductions initiated by the Kyoto Protocol. Delivery of reductions and financing by developed countries will be measured, reported and verified in accordance with existing and any further guidelines adopted by the Conference of the Parties, and will ensure that accounting of such targets and finance is rigorous, robust and transparent.

5. Non-Annex I Parties to the Convention will implement mitigation actions, including those to be submitted to the secretariat by non-Annex I Parties in the format given in Appendix II by 31 January 2010, for compilation in an INF document, consistent with Article 4.1 and Article 4.7 and in the context of sustainable development. Least developed countries and small island developing States may undertake actions voluntarily and on the basis of support. Mitigation actions subsequently taken and envisaged by Non-Annex I Parties, including national inventory reports, shall be communicated through national communications consistent with Article 12.1(b) every two years on the basis of guidelines to be adopted by the Conference of the Parties. Those mitigation actions in national communications or otherwise communicated to the Secretariat will be added to the list in appendix II. Mitigation actions taken by Non-Annex I Parties will be subject to their domestic measurement, reporting and verification the result of which will be reported through their national communications every two years. Non-Annex I Parties will communicate information on the implementation of their actions through National Communications, with provisions for international consultations and analysis under clearly defined guidelines that will ensure that national sovereignty is respected. Nationally appropriate mitigation actions seeking international support will be recorded in a registry along with relevant technology, finance and capacity building support. Those actions supported will be added to the list in appendix II. These supported nationally appropriate mitigation actions will be subject to international measurement, reporting and verification in accordance with guidelines adopted by the Conference of the Parties.

6. We recognize the crucial role of reducing emission from deforestation and forest degradation and the need to enhance removals of greenhouse gas emission by forests and agree on the need to provide positive incentives to such actions through the immediate establishment of a mechanism including REDD-plus, to enable the mobilization of financial resources from developed countries.

7. We decide to pursue various approaches, including opportunities to use markets, to enhance the cost-effectiveness of, and to promote mitigation actions. Developing countries, especially those with low emitting economies should be provided incentives to continue to develop on a low emission pathway.

8. Scaled up, new and additional, predictable and adequate funding as well as improved access shall be provided to developing countries, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Convention, to enable and support enhanced action on mitigation, including substantial finance to reduce emissions from deforestation and forest degradation (REDD-plus), adaptation, technology development and transfer and capacity-building, for enhanced implementation of the Convention. The collective commitment by developed countries is to provide new and additional resources, including forestry and investments through international institutions, approaching USD 30 billion for the period 2010--012 with balanced allocation between adaptation and mitigation. Funding for adaptation will be prioritized for the most vulnerable developing countries, such as the least developed countries, small island developing States and Africa. In the context of meaningful mitigation actions and transparency on implementation, developed countries commit to a goal of mobilizing jointly USD 100 billion dollars a year by 2020 to address the needs of developing countries. This funding will come from a wide variety of sources, public and private, bilateral and multilateral, including alternative sources of finance. New multilateral funding for adaptation will be delivered through effective and efficient fund arrangements, with a governance structure providing for equal representation of developed and developing countries. A significant portion of such funding should flow through the Copenhagen Green Climate Fund.

9. To this end, a High Level Panel will be established under the guidance of and accountable to the Conference of the Parties to study the contribution of the potential sources of revenue, including alternative sources of finance, towards meeting this goal.

10. We decide that the Copenhagen Green Climate Fund shall be established as an operating entity of the financial mechanism of the Convention to support projects, programme, policies and other activities in developing countries related to mitigation including REDD-plus, adaptation, capacity-building, technology development and transfer.

11. In order to enhance action on development and transfer of technology we decide to establish a Technology Mechanism to accelerate technology development and transfer in support of action on adaptation and mitigation that will be guided by a country-driven approach and be based on national circumstances and priorities.

12. We call for an assessment of the implementation of this Accord to be completed by 2015, including in light of the Convention's ultimate objective. This would include consideration of strengthening the long-term goal referencing various matters presented by the science, including in relation to temperature rises of 1.5 degrees Celsius.

128. Suo Moto Statement by Minister of State (Independent Charge), Ministry of Environment and Forests Jairam Ramesh in the Rajya Sabha on the outcome of the Copenhagen Climate Change Conference.

New Delhi, December 22, 2009.

Mr. Chairman Sir,

1. I rise to make a Suo Moto Statement on the 15th Conference of Parties to the UN Convention on Climate Change that was held in Copenhagen, Denmark between December 7-18th, 2009.

2. Before I get into the statement, Sir, let me say that this is the fourth time that I am speaking in some detail on the issue of climate change in recent weeks reflecting our Government's transparency and keenness to keep the Parliament fully informed at every step. It also reflects, of course, the great interest Honourable MPs themselves have in this important subject. There was a Calling Attention Motion in the Rajya Sabha on November 24th and a Zero hour discussion on December 7th. The Lok Sabha had a five-hour debate on December 3rd. Let me reiterate that I am more than prepared to discuss this issue in Parliament at any time, in any form that the House desires and the Chairman directs.

3. To return to the Copenhagen Conference, there were two segments to it. The first was between December 7th -15th that involved negotiations at the official level. The second was between December 16th -18th that involved a High- Level Segment at the Ministerial level. In addition, the Danish Presidency of the Conference of Parties had invited Ministers from all countries for informal consultations from December 12th -17th , 2009. Heads of State/Government had also been invited to the High-Level Segment of the Conference during December 17th -18th 2009. Over a hundred Heads of State/Government attended. Our Prime Minister addressed the Conference on December 18th and I had the privilege of speaking on behalf of the Government of India on December 16th. Copies of these two speeches are attached to this Statement.

4. There were two specific outcomes of the Copenhagen Conference. In Bali, in December 2007, the Conference of Parties had decided to have negotiations on two parallel tracks, both of which were expected to be concluded at Copenhagen. The first track relates to the outcome of the Bali Action Plan and the other track pertains to the commitment of the Annex I Parties for the second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol in the period extending beyond 2012. These negotiations could not be concluded and the Copenhagen Conference decided to continue these negotiations to be completed at the end of 2010 at the 16th Conference of Parties to be held in Mexico City in December 2010. In this respect, India, South Africa, Brazil, China and other developing countries were entirely successful in ensuring that there was no violation of the mandate for the Bali Action Plan negotiations on the enhanced implementation of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. Despite relentless attempts made by the Annex I Parties, the Conference succeeded in continuing the negotiations under the Kyoto Protocol to establish the commitments of the Annex I Parties under the Kyoto Protocol for the post-2012 period. Undoubtedly, many developed countries want to see an end to the Kyoto Protocol but we have been able to thwart these attempts for the time being. The major outcome of the Conference is, therefore, the fact that the negotiations under the UNFCCC will continue to proceed in two tracks as set out in the Bali Road Map-- one relating to the long-term cooperative action for enhancing the implementation of the Convention and the second relating to the second commitment period of Annex I Parties under the Kyoto Protocol.

5. Another decision taken by the Conference relates to the Copenhagen Accord. India, along with over twenty five other countries that included Bangladesh, Maldives, Indonesia, China, Japan, South Korea, Papua New Guinea, Australia, Russia, Mexico, USA, Brazil, Colombia, Granada, South Africa, Algeria, Sudan, Gabon, Saudi Arabia, United Kingdom, France, Germany, Spain and European Union, was invited by the host country to assist the President of the Conference in forging a consensus on several outstanding issues. The results of such informal consultations held on December 17th and 18th 2009, were brought by the COP President, on his own responsibility, to the Plenary of the Conference for consideration on December 18th, 2009. Some countries that included Cuba, Nicaragua, Venezuela and Bolivia did not join the consensus on the draft Copenhagen Accord presented by the COP President. Since the Conference works on the principle of consensus, the Copenhagen Accord was not adopted as an outcome of the Conference. It was, however, taken note of. The contents of the Accord are not legally binding nor do they constitute a mandate for a new negotiating process under the UNFCCC.

6. The Copenhagen Accord deals with the various elements of the Bali Action Plan relating to the issues of mitigation, adaptation, financing and technology in the context of climate change. Let me present to you the highlights of the Accord.

7. The Accord recognizes the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities of the Parties in combating climate change. The Accord recognizes the need to limit the global temperature rise by 2050 to below 2 degree Celsius above pre-industrial levels. While doing so, the Accord clearly sets out the goal in the context of equity and sustainable development. This ensures that in achieving this goal, the right of the developing countries to have an equitable share in access to global atmospheric resources cannot be ignored and is ensured. I might add here that this was a point repeatedly made by the Prime Minister in all his interactions.

8. The Copenhagen Accord does speak of "cooperation in achieving the peaking of global and national emissions as soon as possible". However, the Accord explicitly recognises that the time frame for peaking will be longer in developing countries. It also bears in mind that "social and economic development and poverty eradication are the first and overriding priorities of developing countries". The Accord therefore, does not speak of a specific year for peaking for developing countries which has always been on the agenda of the developed countries. This is another area of success for us at Copenhagen. This is also consistent with the position of India was outlined by our Prime Minister over two years ago that our per capita emissions will never exceed the average per capita emissions of the developed countries.

9. There has been insistence from the developed countries to adopt quantified emission reduction targets in the long-term by the global community. A global goal of 50% emissions reduction by 2050 with reference to current levels of emissions has been generally emphasized by the Annex I countries. Reference to such a specific numerical target in terms of emission reduction has been avoided in the Accord because of the insistence of the developing countries, particularly India that a global goal should be expressed only in terms of limit in increase of temperature and not in terms of a quantified emission reduction target. This is because such a target would result in a binding commitment for the developing countries who do not have such obligations under the UNFCCC. We can be satisfied that we were able to get our way on this issue as well.

10. The Accord obliges the Annex I countries to indicate their mid-term emissions reduction target for 2020 by January 31, 2010 to the Secretariat. Their actions in respect of emission reduction and financing support given to developing countries for mitigation actions in developing countries will be subject to measurement, reporting and verification as per the guidelines adopted by the Conference of Parties.

11. The mitigation actions of the developing countries are to be supported by the developed countries in Accordance with Article 4.7 of the UNFCCC. Mitigation actions of developing countries will be subject to domestic measurement, reporting and verification as per its internal procedures. Report of such mitigation actions, supported or unsupported will be made to the Secretariat through the National Communications which will be made every two years. There is a provision for international consultations and analysis for implementation of the actions reported through National Communications. The guidelines for such consultation and analysis will be devised and defined in due course. We have been able to incorporate a specific provision that these "clearly defined guidelines will ensure that the national sovereignty is respected". This is another accomplishment for us at Copenhagen. Of course, as I have stated on earlier occasions, the supported mitigation actions will be open to international measurement, report and verification as per guidelines adopted by the Conference of Parties.

12. Under the Accord, the developed country Parties have agreed to set up a Climate Fund named "Copenhagen Green Climate Fund" to provide resources approaching US$ 30 billion during the period 2010-2012 to support the adaptation and mitigation actions of the developing country Parties. The funding for adaptation will be focused on the least developed countries, small island developing States and Africa. They have also undertaken a commitment to mobilize US $ 100 billion a year by 2020 for such purposes and a high level panel will be set up under the guidance of Conference of Parties to review the progress of these commitments.

13. A Technology Mechanism is also proposed to be established to accelerate technology development and transfer in support of adaptation and mitigation actions in the developing countries. Negotiations on the precise architecture of this Mechanism are underway in the UNFCCC and I am pleased to mention that many of the proposals made by India in this regard have found acceptance. A network of technology innovation centres has been proposed by India as a part of this mechanism.

14. The objectives and the implementation of the Accord will be assessed and the process of assessment will be completed by 2015 in order to consider the possibility of further strengthening the long term goal of limiting the temperature rise to below 1.5 degree Celsius. This was in response to a demand made by 43 small island developing states that includes Maldives. Bangladesh and Nepal have also supported this idea.

15. Sir, a notable feature of this Conference that has been widely commented on is the manner in which the BASIC group of countries coordinated their positions. Ministers of the BASIC group comprising Brazil, South Africa, India and China has met in Beijing on November 27th and 28th, 2009 to prepare for Copenhagen in a joint manner. Honourable Members may recall that I had briefed them in my earlier interventions on the results of that meeting. The BASIC Group Ministers met virtually on an hourly basis right through the Copenhagen Conference. Within BASIC, India and China worked very, very closely together. I believe that the BASIC group has emerged as a powerful force in climate change negotiations and India should have every reason to be satisfied it has played a catalyzing role in the emergence of this new quartet. Their unity was instrumental in ensuring that the Accord was finalized in accordance with the negotiating framework as laid out in the UNFCCC, Bali Action Plan and the Kyoto Protocol. We will continue to work together with these countries as well as other countries of the G-77 to ensure that the interests of the developing countries and India in particular are protected in course of negotiations in 2010 and beyond. I should also mention here that President Obama interacted with the two Prime Ministers and two Presidents of the BASIC Group and it was at this meeting that the Copenhagen Accord was clinched to the satisfaction of all present. It was at this crucial meeting that the BASIC group was able to get agreement on its proposals on global goals and on monitoring and verification. It was also able to ensure that the Copenhagen Accord was not legally binding and that there was no mention of a new legally binding instrument in the Accord.

16. Sir, I have been somewhat detailed in this suo moto statement. I have never hidden anything from this Parliament and have been very upfront about how our thinking on climate change has to evolve and not remain frozen in time. I have repeatedly sought flexibility within a framework of certain non-negotiables. Earlier, I spoke to both Houses on the basis of my intentions and had said that ultimately actions will speak louder than words. I had assured both Houses that we will negotiate in a manner that the national interest is not only protected but also enhanced. Copenhagen is not a destination but the beginning of a long process. There are indeed many risks, many hazards, many threats. We have to be extraordinarily vigilant and watchful, negotiating tough but always from a position of strength. For the moment I believe that India has come out quite well at Copenhagen and we have been recognized for our constructive approach.

We will continue to play such a role. We have to deepen our capacity to pursue proactive climate diplomacy internationally. We have to get down to implementing a comprehensive domestic agenda of both adaptation and mitigation and of moving on the road to cutting our emissions intensity of GDP by 20-25% by 2020 on 2005 levels which is not only eminently feasible but which can also be improved upon to the benefit of our own people. We must soon unveil a detailed roadmap for a low-carbon growth strategy. We must also strengthen our own scientific capacity to measure, monitor and model the impacts of climate change on different sectors of our economy and in different regions of our country.

17. Mr. Chairman, Sir I will now be more than glad and willing to clarify any doubts and answer any questions that Honourable Members may wish to raise. I see this statement as part of a continuing dialogue between our government and Honourable MPs, as a reflection of our determination to ensure accountability to Parliament.

On December 21 Prodipto Ghosh, former Secretary of the Ministry of Environment and Forests and member of the Indian Delegation to the Conference admitted that the most difficult and contentious task would be the finalisation of guidelines for the international consultation and analysis of the mitigation actions, now to be drafted while "respecting national sovereignty." He told The Hindu that the accord was a process that would continue through the next year and culminate in Mexico City at the 16th session of the Conference of the Parties of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. Mr. Ghosh pointed out since the developing countries, including India, had refused to accept international monitoring, reporting and verification of unsupported mitigation actions - though it was willing to be "flexible" - the accord states that actions by developing countries that were not supported through international finance and technology would also be open to international "consultation and analysis."

129. Press Release by the Prime Minister's Office on Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's call to the Economists to address the adverse effects of poverty and pressure due to Climate Change.

Bhubaneswar (Orissa) , December 27, 2009.

Prime Minister Dr. Man Mohan Singh has called upon the Economists of the country to evolve mechanism to address the problems to poverty and pressure on Indian Economy due to climate change. Poverty remains a major challenge and poor are still too poor and we need to do much more improve their standard of living. To meet the end, the economy has to grow fast enough to create new job opportunities at a rate of faster than the growth of labour force. Our goal is inclusive growth and this has been explicitly enshrined in our Eleventh Five Year Plan. To achieve our objective of inclusive growth we need to pay much greater attention to education, healthcare and rural development focusing particularly on the needs of the poor, SC, ST and minorities, PM added.

On the efficient and economic use of scarce natural resources like land and water, Prime Minister said that special attention has to be paid to increase agricultural productivity of small and marginal farmer. The world faces a new difficult challenge in the form of climate change. Issues arising out of climate change and its impact give rise to new concerns about a sustainable path of development. Sustainable development gets infinitely linked with energy efficiency and energy security. Economists have much to contribute to our understanding the complexities involved and finding constructive solutions, Dr. Singh said. He further said that over all greater emphasis has to be laid on reforms of the systems of governance so as to reduce the corruption, lower the transaction costs of starting new business and create of an environment conducive of promotion of innovation and risk bearing.

Calling upon the economists not to be confused with cyclical behaviour of Indian Economy Prime Minister said that since 1991, our economy has seen ups and downs due to factors like East Asian Crisis, global economic crisis etc. We should therefore look at the average growth rate after 1991. If we consider the 18 years from 1992-93 to 2009-10 the average growth rate is 6.8 %. The congress led government that has been in place since 2004-05 can claim to have achieved an average growth rate between 2004-05 and 2009-10 that is likely to be 8.5%. We can therefore claim that we have entered the target range for growth set by Pandit Jawahar Lal Nehru long years ago, PM added.

On poverty PM told that the percentage of population below the poverty line has certainly not increased. In fact it has continued to decline after the economic reforms at least at the same rate as it did before. It is true that the rate of decline has not been faster as it should be, but it has declined, PM added.

Addressing the conference, Orissa Chief Minister Shri Naveen Patnaik said that his government takes steps to make Orissa an investor friendly state. His government is striving hard for improving fiscal health. He future said that priority is being given on agriculture, education, health care, rural connectivity, irrigation, electricity like infrastructure development to reduce social and gender disqualifies. President of India Economic Association Prof C. H. Henumant Rao welcoming PM detailed out the deliberations scheduled in this three days 92nd Annual Conference of IEA in Bhubaneswar. Eminent Economists of the country have joined to discuss on the economic jagruti and various economic issues that our country faces today particularly in a period of global economic crisis.

5.4. Especially designed or prepared auxiliary systems, equipment and components for use in gaseous diffusion enrichment

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

The auxiliary systems, equipment and components for gaseous diffusion enrichment plants are the systems of plant needed to feed UF<sub>6</sub> to the gaseous diffusion assembly, to link the individual assemblies to each other to form cascades (or stages) to allow for progressively higher enrichments and to extract the 'product' and 'tails' UF<sub>6</sub> from the diffusion cascades. Because of the high inertial properties of diffusion cascades, any interruption in their operation, and especially their shut-down, leads to serious consequences. Therefore, a strict and constant maintenance of vacuum in all technological systems, automatic protection from accidents, and precise automated regulation of the gas flow is of importance in a gaseous diffusion plant. All this leads to a need to equip the plant with a large number of special measuring, regulating and controlling systems. Normally UF<sub>6</sub> is evaporated from cylinders placed within autoclaves and is distributed in gaseous form to the entry point by way of cascade header pipework. The 'product' and 'tails' UF<sub>6</sub> gaseous streams flowing from exit points are passed by way of cascade header pipework to either cold traps or to compression stations where the UF<sub>6</sub> gas is liquefied prior to onward transfer into suitable containers for transportation or storage. Because a gaseous diffusion enrichment plant consists of a large number of gaseous diffusion assemblies arranged in cascades, there are many kilometers of cascade header pipework, incorporating thousands of welds with substantial amounts of repetition of layout. The equipment, components and piping systems are fabricated to very high vacuum and cleanliness standards.

15. India shall notify the Agency of the receipt of any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components referred to in paragraph 11(b) of this Agreement within four weeks of the arrival in India of such nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components.

Provision of Information to the Agency

16. In the event that India's notification pursuant to paragraph 14(a) of this Agreement relates to a facility subject to Agency safeguards under another Safeguards Agreement or Agreements in India at the time of entry into force of this Agreement, India shall provide the Agency, along with the relevant notification, such information as is required pursuant to the other Safeguards Agreement or Agreements as relates to any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components subject to safeguards thereunder.

17. With respect to any other facility listed in the Annex pursuant to paragraph 14(a) of this Agreement, India shall provide the Agency, within four weeks of the relevant notification, with:

- (a) a list of all nuclear material at each such facility; and
- (b) where relevant, and if required pursuant to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement to which India is party, information relating to:
  - (i) Any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components supplied to India for production, processing, storage or use in such facility;
  - (ii) Any nuclear material, including subsequent generations of special fissionable material, produced, processed or used in or by the use of such facility or in or by the use of any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components supplied to India for production, processing or use in such facility.

18. Each notification pursuant to paragraph 15 of the Agreement shall include all information relevant to the nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components so notified, including the facility or location where the nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components so notified will be received.

19. The information provided by India pursuant to paragraphs 16, 17 and 18 of this Agreement shall specify, inter alia, to the extent relevant, the nuclear and chemical composition, physical form and quantity of the nuclear material; the date of shipment; the date of receipt; the identity of the consigner and the consignee; and any other relevant information, such as the type and capacity of any facility (or parts thereof), components or equipment; and the type and quantity of non-nuclear material. In the case of a facility or other location subject to this Agreement, the information to be provided shall include the type and capacity of that facility or location, and any other relevant information.

20. India shall thereafter notify the Agency by means of reports, in accordance with this Agreement, of any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components referred to in paragraph 11(b), (c), (d) or (e) of this Agreement. The Agency may verify the calculations of the amounts and/or quantities of such nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment and components, and appropriate adjustments shall be made by agreement between India and the Agency.

21. The Agency shall maintain an inventory of items subject to this Agreement. The Agency shall send a copy of the inventory it maintains with respect to such information to India every twelve months and also at any other times specified by India in a request communicated to the Agency at least two weeks in advance.

B. SAFEGUARDS UNDER OTHER AGREEMENTS

22. The application of Agency safeguards under other Safeguards Agreements concluded by India with the Agency and in force at the time of entry into force of this Agreement may, subject to agreement by the Parties to such other Safeguards Agreements and following notification by India of the relevant facilities pursuant to paragraph 14(a), be suspended while this Agreement is in force. The application of safeguards under this Agreement to nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or components subject to safeguards under such other Agreements shall commence as of the date of receipt by the Agency of India's notification. India's undertaking not to use items subject thereto in such a way as to further any military purpose, and its undertaking that such items shall be used exclusively for peaceful purposes and shall not be used for the manufacture of any nuclear explosive device, shall continue to apply.

C. EXEMPTIONS FROM SAFEGUARDS

General Exemptions

23. Nuclear material that would otherwise be subject to safeguards shall be exempted from safeguards at the request of India, provided that the material so exempted in India may not at any time exceed:

(a) 1 kilogram in total of special fissionable material, which may consist of one or more of the following:

(i) Plutonium;

(ii) Uranium with an enrichment of 0.2 (20 %) and above, taken account of by multiplying its weight by its enrichment;

(iii) Uranium with an enrichment below 0.2 (20 %) and above that of natural uranium, taken account of by multiplying its weight by five times the square of its enrichment;

- (b) 10 metric tons in total of natural uranium and depleted uranium with an enrichment above 0.005 (0.5 %);
- (c) 20 metric tons of depleted uranium with an enrichment of 0.005 (0.5 %) or below; and
- (d) 20 metric tons of thorium.

Exemptions Related to Reactors

24. Produced or used nuclear material that would otherwise be subject to safeguards because it is being or has been produced, processed or used in a reactor which has been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement; or because it is being or has been produced in or by the use of safeguarded nuclear material, shall be exempted from safeguards if:

- (a) It is plutonium produced in the fuel of a reactor whose rate of production does not exceed 100 grams of plutonium per year; or
- (b) It is produced in a reactor determined by the Agency to have a maximum calculated power for continuous operation of less than 3 thermal megawatts, or is used in such a reactor and would not be subject to safeguards except for such use, provided that the total power of the reactors with respect to which these exemptions apply in any State may not exceed 6 thermal megawatts.

25. Produced special fissionable material that would otherwise be subject to safeguards only because it has been produced in or by the use of safeguarded nuclear material shall in part be exempted from safeguards if it is produced in a reactor in which the ratio of fissionable isotopes within safeguarded nuclear material to all fissionable isotopes is less than 0.3 (calculated each time any change is made in the loading of the reactor and assumed to be maintained until the next such change). Such fraction of the produced material as corresponds to the calculated ratio shall be subject to safeguards.

D. SUSPENSION OF SAFEGUARDS

26. Safeguards with respect to nuclear material may be suspended while the material is transferred, under an arrangement or agreement approved by the Agency, for the purpose of processing, reprocessing, testing, research or development, within India or to any other Member State or to an international organization, provided that the quantities of nuclear material with respect to which safeguards are thus suspended in India may not at any time exceed:

- (a) 1 effective kilogram of special fissionable material;
- (b) 10 metric tons in total of natural uranium and depleted uranium with an enrichment 0.005 (0.5 %);
- (c) 20 metric tons of depleted uranium with an enrichment of 0.005 (0.5 %) or below; and
- (d) 20 metric tons of thorium.

27. Safeguards with respect to nuclear material in irradiated fuel which is transferred for the purpose of reprocessing may also be suspended if the State or States concerned have, with the agreement of the Agency, placed under safeguards substitute nuclear material in accordance with paragraph 30(d) of this Agreement for the period of suspension. In addition, safeguards with respect to plutonium contained in irradiated fuel which is transferred for the purpose of reprocessing may be suspended for a period not to exceed six months if the State or States concerned have, with the agreement of the Agency, placed under safeguards a quantity of uranium whose enrichment in the isotope uranium-235 is not less than 0.9 (90%) and the uranium-235 content of which is equal in weight to such plutonium. Upon expiration of the said six months or the completion of reprocessing, whichever is earlier, safeguards shall, with the agreement of the Agency, be applied to such plutonium and shall cease to apply to the uranium substituted therefor.

28. Under conditions specified in the Subsidiary Arrangements, the Agency shall suspend safeguards with respect to any parts of the facilities listed in the Annex which are removed for maintenance or repair.

E. TERMINATION OF SAFEGUARDS

29. The termination of safeguards on items subject to this Agreement shall be implemented taking into account the provisions of GOV/1621 (20 August 1973).

30. Nuclear material shall no longer be subject to safeguards under this Agreement after:

- (a) It has been returned to the State that originally supplied it (whether directly or through the Agency), if it was subject to safeguards only by reason of such supply and if:

- (i) It was not improved while under safeguards; or
    - (ii) Any special fissionable material that was produced in it under safeguards has been separated out, or safeguards with respect to such produced material have been terminated; or
  - (b) The Agency has determined that:
    - (i) It was subject to safeguards only by reason of its use in a principal nuclear facility which has been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement;
    - (ii) It has been removed from such a facility; and
    - (iii) Any special fissionable material that was produced in it under safeguards has been separated out, or safeguards with respect to such produced material have been terminated; or
  - (c) The Agency has determined that it has been consumed, or has been diluted in such a way that it is no longer usable for any nuclear activity relevant from the point of view of safeguards, or has become practicably irrecoverable; or
  - (d) India has, with the agreement of the Agency, placed under safeguards, as a substitute, such amount of the same element, not otherwise subject to safeguards, as the Agency has determined contains fissionable isotopes:
    - (i) Whose weight (with due allowance for processing losses) is equal to or greater than the weight of the fissionable isotopes of the material with respect to which safeguards are to terminate; and
    - (ii) Whose ratio by weight to the total substituted element is similar to or greater than the ratio by weight of the fissionable isotopes of the material with respect to which safeguards are to terminate to the total weight of such material;
- provided that the Agency may agree to the substitution of plutonium for uranium-235 contained in uranium whose enrichment is not greater than 0.05 (5.0 %); or
- (e) It has been transferred out of India under paragraph 33(d) of this Agreement, provided that such material shall again be subject to safeguards if it is returned to India; or

(f) The terms of this Agreement, pursuant to which it was subject to safeguards under this Agreement, no longer apply, by expiration of this Agreement or otherwise.

31. If India wishes to use safeguarded source material for non-nuclear purposes, such as the production of alloys or ceramics, it shall agree with the Agency on the circumstances under which the safeguards on such material may be terminated.

32. Safeguards shall be terminated on a facility listed in the Annex after India and the Agency have jointly determined that the facility is no longer usable for any nuclear activity relevant from the point of view of safeguards. Safeguards on non-nuclear material, equipment and components subject to this Agreement may be terminated as and when the non-nuclear material, equipment or components have been returned to the supplier or arrangements have been made by the Agency to safeguard the non-nuclear material, equipment or components in the State to which it is being transferred, or when India and the Agency have jointly determined that the non-nuclear material, equipment or component in question has been consumed, is no longer usable for any nuclear activity relevant from the point of view of safeguards or has become practicably irrecoverable.

Safeguards may be terminated on heavy water upon India's placing under safeguards as substitute the same amount of heavy water of equivalent or better heavy water concentration.

F. TRANSFERS

33. No safeguarded nuclear material shall be transferred outside the jurisdiction of India until the Agency has satisfied itself that one or more of the following conditions apply:

(a) The material is being returned, under the conditions specified in paragraph 30(a) of this Agreement, to the State that originally supplied it; or

(b) The material is being transferred subject to the provisions of paragraph 26 or 27 of this Agreement; or

(c) Arrangements have been made by the Agency to safeguard the material in the State to which it is being transferred; or

(d) The material was not subject to safeguards pursuant to a project agreement and will be subject, in the State to which it is being transferred, to safeguards other than those of the Agency but generally consistent with such safeguards and accepted by the Agency.

34. India shall notify the Agency of its intention to transfer within its jurisdiction any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component subject to this Agreement to any facility or location in India to which paragraph 11(f) applies and shall provide to the Agency, before such transfer is effected, the necessary information to enable the Agency to make arrangements for the application of safeguards to such nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component after its transfer. The Agency shall also be given the opportunity as early as possible in advance of such a transfer to review the design of the facility for the sole purpose of determining that the arrangements provided for in this Agreement can be effectively applied. India may transfer the nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component only after the Agency has confirmed that it has made such arrangements.

35. India shall notify the Agency of its intention to transfer any nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component subject to this Agreement to a recipient which is not under the jurisdiction of India. Except as provided for in paragraph 30(a) of this Agreement, such nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component shall be so transferred only after the Agency has informed India that it has satisfied itself that Agency safeguards will apply with respect to the nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component in the recipient country. Upon receipt by the Agency of the notification of transfer from India and the confirmation of receipt by the recipient country, safeguards on such nuclear material, non-nuclear material, equipment or component shall be terminated under this Agreement.

36. The notifications referred to in paragraphs 34 and 35 of this Agreement shall be made to the Agency sufficiently in advance to enable it to make the arrangements required before the transfer is effected. The Agency shall promptly take any necessary action. The time limits for and the contents of these notifications shall be set out in the Subsidiary Arrangements.

III. SAFEGUARDS PROCEDURES

A. GENERAL PROCEDURES

Introduction

37. The safeguards procedures to be applied by the Agency are those specified in this Agreement, as well as such additional procedures as result from technological developments, and other procedures as may be agreed to between the Agency and India. The safeguards procedures set forth below shall be followed, as far as relevant, with respect to any item subject to this Agreement.

38. The Agency shall conclude with India Subsidiary Arrangements concerning the implementation of the safeguards procedures referred to above. The Subsidiary Arrangements shall also include any necessary arrangements for the application of safeguards to any item subject to this Agreement, including such containment and surveillance measures as are required for the effective implementation of safeguards. The Subsidiary Arrangements shall enter into force no later than six months after entry into force of this Agreement.

Design Review

39. The Agency shall review the design of principal nuclear facilities, for the sole purpose of satisfying itself that a facility will permit the effective application of safeguards.

40. The design review of a principal nuclear facility shall take place at as early a stage as possible. In particular, such review shall be carried out in the case of:

- (a) An Agency project, before the project is approved;
- (b) A bilateral or multilateral arrangement under which the responsibility for administering safeguards is to be transferred to the Agency, or an activity or facility unilaterally submitted by India, before the Agency assumes safeguards responsibilities with respect to the facility;
- (c) A transfer of safeguarded nuclear material to a principal nuclear facility whose design has not previously been reviewed, before such transfer takes place; and
- (d) A significant modification of a principal nuclear facility whose design has previously been reviewed, before such modification is undertaken.

41. To enable the Agency to perform the required design review, India shall submit to it relevant design information sufficient for the purpose, including information on such basic characteristics of the principal nuclear facility as may bear on the Agency's safeguards procedures. The Agency shall require only the minimum amount of information and data consistent with carrying out its responsibility under this section. It shall complete the review promptly after the submission of this information by India and shall notify the latter of its conclusions without delay.

42. If the Agency wishes to examine design information which India regards as sensitive, the Agency shall, if India so requests, conduct the examination on premises in India. Such information should not be physically transmitted to the Agency provided that it remains readily available for examination by the Agency in India.

Records

43. India shall arrange for the keeping of records with respect to principal nuclear facilities and also with respect to all safeguarded nuclear material outside such facilities. For this purpose India and the Agency shall agree on a system of records with respect to each facility and also with respect to such material, on the basis of proposals to be submitted by India in sufficient time to allow the Agency to review them before the records need to be kept.

44. All records shall be kept in English.

45. The records shall consist, as appropriate, of:

(a) Accounting records of all safeguarded nuclear material; and

(b) Operating records for principal nuclear facilities.

46. All records shall be retained for at least two years.

Reports

General Requirements

47. India shall submit to the Agency reports with respect to the production, processing and use of safeguarded nuclear material in or outside principal nuclear facilities. For this purpose, India and the Agency shall agree on a system of reports with respect to each facility and also with respect to safeguarded nuclear material outside such facilities, on the basis of proposals to be submitted by India in sufficient time to allow the Agency to review them before the reports need to be submitted. The reports need include only such information as is relevant for the purpose of safeguards.

48. All reports shall be submitted in English.

Routine Reports

49. Routine reports shall be based on the records compiled in accordance with paragraphs 43 to 46 of this Agreement and shall consist, as appropriate, of:

- (a) Accounting reports showing the receipt, transfer out, inventory and use of all safeguarded nuclear material. The inventory shall indicate the nuclear and chemical composition and physical form of all material and its location on the date of the report; and
- (b) Operating reports showing the use that has been made of each principal nuclear facility since the last report and, as far as possible, the programme of future work in the period until the next routine report is expected to reach the Agency.

50. The first routine report shall be submitted as soon as:

- (a) There is any safeguarded nuclear material to be accounted for; or
- (b) The principal nuclear facility to which it relates is in a condition to operate.

Progress in Construction

51. The Agency may request information as to when particular stages in the construction of a principal nuclear facility have been or are to be reached.

Special Reports

52. India shall report to the Agency without delay:

- (a) If any unusual incident occurs involving actual or potential loss or destruction of, or damage to, any safeguarded nuclear material or principal nuclear facility;
- (b) If there is good reason to believe that safeguarded nuclear material is lost or unaccounted for in quantities that exceed the normal operating and handling losses that have been accepted by the Agency as characteristic of the facility; or
- (c) Disruption of operation of facilities listed in the Annex on account of material violation or breach of bilateral or multilateral arrangements to which India is a party.

53. India shall report to the Agency, as soon as possible, and in any case within two weeks, any transfer not requiring advance notification that will result in a significant change (to be defined by the Agency in agreement with India) in the quantity of safeguarded nuclear material in a principal nuclear facility. Such report shall indicate the amount and nature of the material and its intended use.

Amplification of Reports

54. At the Agency's request, India shall submit amplifications or clarifications of any report, in so far as relevant for the purpose of safeguards.

Inspections

General Procedures

55. The Agency may inspect any items subject to this Agreement.

56. The purpose of safeguards inspections under this Agreement shall be to verify compliance by India with this Agreement and to assist India in complying with this Agreement and in resolving any questions arising out of the implementation of safeguards.

57. The number, duration and intensity of inspections actually carried out shall be kept to the minimum consistent with the effective implementation of safeguards, and if the Agency considers that the authorized inspections are not all required, fewer shall be carried out.

58. Inspectors shall neither operate any facility themselves nor direct the staff of a facility to carry out any particular operation.

Routine Inspections

59. Routine inspections may include, as appropriate:

- (a) Audit of records and reports;
- (b) Verification of the amount of safeguarded nuclear material by physical inspection, measurement and sampling;
- (c) Examination of principal nuclear facilities, including a check of their measuring instrument and operating characteristics; and
- (d) Check of the operations carried out at principal nuclear facilities.

60. Whenever the Agency has the right of access to a principal nuclear facility at all times, it may perform inspections of which notice as required by paragraph 4 of the Inspectors Document need not be given, in so far as this is necessary for the effective application of safeguards. The actual procedures to implement these provisions shall be agreed upon between India and the Agency.

Initial Inspections of a Principal Nuclear Facility

61. To verify that the construction of a principal nuclear facility is in accordance with the design reviewed by the Agency, an initial inspection or inspections of the facility may be carried out:

- (a) As soon as possible after the facility has come under Agency safeguards, in the case of a facility already in operation; and
- (b) Before the facility starts to operate, in other cases.

62. The measuring instruments and operating characteristics of the facility shall be reviewed to the extent necessary for the purpose of implementing safeguards. Instruments that will be used to obtain data on the nuclear materials in the facility may be tested to determine their satisfactory functioning. Such testing may include the observation by inspectors of commissioning or routine tests by the staff of the facility, but shall not hamper or delay the construction, commissioning or normal operation of the facility.

Special Inspections

63. The Agency may carry out special inspections if:

- (a) The study of a report indicates that such inspection is desirable; or
- (b) Any unforeseen circumstance requires immediate action.

The Board shall subsequently be informed of the reasons for and the results of each such inspection.

64. The Agency may also carry out special inspections of substantial amounts of safeguarded nuclear material that are to be transferred outside the jurisdiction of India, for which purpose India shall give the Agency sufficient advance notice of any such proposed transfer.

B. SPECIAL PROCEDURES FOR REACTORS

Reports

65. The frequency of submission of routine reports shall be agreed between the Agency and India, taking into account the frequency established for routine inspections. However, at least two such reports shall be submitted each year and in no case shall more than 12 such reports be required in any year.

Inspections

66. One of the initial inspections of a reactor shall if possible be made just before the reactor first reaches criticality.

67. The maximum frequency of routine inspections of a reactor and of the safeguarded nuclear material in it shall be determined from the following table:

Whichever is the largest of:

- (a) Facility inventory (including loading);
- (b) Annual throughput;
- (c) Maximum potential annual production of special fissionable material (Effective kilograms of nuclear material)

- (a) The fact that India possesses irradiated fuel reprocessing facilities;
  - (b) The nature of the reactor; and
  - (c) The nature and amount of the nuclear material produced or used in the reactor.

C. SPECIAL PROCEDURES RELATING TO SAFEGUARDED NUCLEAR MATERIAL OUTSIDE PRINCIPAL NUCLEAR FACILITIES

Nuclear Material in Research and Development Facilities

Routine Reports

69. Only accounting reports need be submitted in respect of nuclear material in research and development facilities. The frequency of submission of such routine reports shall be agreed between the Agency and India, taking into account the frequency established for routine inspections; however, at least one such report shall be submitted each year and in no case shall more than 12 such reports be required in any year.

Routine Inspections

70. The maximum frequency of routine inspections of safeguarded nuclear material in a research and development facility shall be that specified in the table in paragraph 67 of this Agreement for the total amount of material in the facility.

Source Material in Sealed Storage

71. The following simplified procedures for safeguarding stockpiled source material shall be applied if India undertakes to store such material in a sealed storage facility and not to remove it therefrom without previously informing the Agency.

Design of Storage Facilities

72. India shall submit to the Agency information on the design of each sealed storage facility and agree with the Agency on the method and procedure for sealing it.

Routine Reports

73. Two routine accounting reports in respect of source material in sealed storage shall be submitted each year.

Routine Inspections

74. The Agency may perform one routine inspection of each sealed storage facility annually.

Removal of Material

75. India may remove safeguarded source material from a sealed storage facility after informing the Agency of the amount, type and intended use of the material to be removed, and providing sufficient other data in time to enable the Agency to continue safeguarding the material after it has been removed.

Nuclear Material in Other Locations

76. Except to the extent that safeguarded nuclear material outside of principal nuclear facilities is covered by any of the provisions set forth in paragraphs 69 to 75 of this Agreement, the following procedures shall be applied with respect to such material (for example, source material stored elsewhere than in a sealed storage facility, or special fissionable material used in a sealed neutron source in the field).

Routine Reports

77. Routine accounting reports in respect of all safeguarded nuclear material in this category shall be submitted periodically. The frequency of submission of such reports shall be agreed between the Agency and India, taking into account the frequency established for routine inspections; however, at least one such report shall be submitted each year and in no case shall more than 12 such reports be required in any year.

Routine Inspections

78. The maximum frequency of routine inspections of safeguarded nuclear material in this category shall be one inspection annually if the total amount of such material does not exceed five effective kilograms, and shall be determined from the table in paragraph 67 of this Agreement if the amount is greater.

D. PROVISIONS FOR REPROCESSING PLANTS*Introduction

79. Additional procedures applicable to the safeguarding of reprocessing plants are set out below.

Special Procedures

Reports

80. The frequency of submission of routine reports shall be once each calendar month.

Inspections

81. A reprocessing plant having an annual throughput not exceeding 5 effective kilograms of nuclear material, and the safeguarded nuclear material in it, may be routinely inspected twice year.

A reprocessing plant, having an annual throughput exceeding 5 effective kilograms of nuclear material, and the safeguarded nuclear material in it, may be inspected at all times. The arrangements for inspections set forth in paragraph 60 of this Agreement shall apply to all inspections to be made under this paragraph. It is understood that for plants having an annual throughput of more than 60 effective kilograms, the right of access at all times would be normally be implemented by means of continuous inspection.

82. When a reprocessing plant is under Agency safeguards only because it contains safeguarded nuclear material, the inspection frequency shall be based on the rate of delivery of safeguarded nuclear material.

83. India and the Agency shall cooperate in making all the necessary arrangements to facilitate the taking, shipping or analysis of samples, due account being taken of the limitations imposed by the characteristics of a plant already in operation when placed under Agency safeguards.

Mixtures of Safeguarded and Unsafeguarded Nuclear Material

84. India and the Agency may agree on the following special arrangements in the case of a reprocessing plant which has not been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement, and in which safeguarded and unsafeguarded nuclear materials are present:

(a) Subject to the provisions of sub-paragraph (b) below, the Agency shall restrict its safeguards procedures to the area in which irradiated fuel is stored, until such time as all or any part of such fuel is transferred out of the storage area into other parts of the plant. Safeguards procedures shall cease to apply to the storage area or plant when either contains no safeguarded nuclear material; and

(b) Where possible, safeguarded nuclear material shall be measured and sampled separately from unsafeguarded material, and at as early a stage as possible. Where separate measurement, sampling or processing are not possible, the whole of the material being processed in that campaign shall be subject to the safeguards procedures set out in Part III.D of this Agreement.

At the conclusion of the processing the nuclear material that is thereafter to be safeguarded shall be selected by agreement between India and the Agency from the whole output of the plant resulting from that campaign, due account being taken of any processing losses accepted by the Agency.

E. PROVISIONS FOR CONVERSION PLANTS, ENRICHMENT PLANTS AND FABRICATION PLANTS

Introduction

85. Additional procedures applicable to conversion plants and fabrication plants are set out below.

This terminology is synonymous with the term “a plant for processing or fabricating nuclear material (excepting a mine or ore-processing plant)” which is used in paragraph 117 of this Agreement.

86. In the event that India decides to offer an enrichment plant in the future as a facility subject to this Agreement, the Agency and India shall consult and agree on the application of the Agency’s safeguards procedures for enrichment plants before any such facility is added to the Annex.

Special Procedures

Reports

87. The frequency of submission of routine reports shall be once each calendar month.

Inspections

88. A conversion plant or a fabrication plant which has been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement, or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement, and the nuclear material in it, may be inspected at all times if the plant inventory at any time, or the annual input, of nuclear material exceeds five effective kilograms. Where neither the inventory at any time, nor the annual input, exceeds five effective kilograms of nuclear material, the routine inspections shall not exceed two a year. The arrangements for inspections set forth in paragraph 57 of this Agreement shall apply to all inspections to be made under this paragraph. It is understood that, for plants having an inventory at any time, or an annual input, of more than 60 effective kilograms, the right of access at all times would normally be implemented by means of continuous inspection. Where neither the inventory at any time nor the annual input exceeds one effective kilogram of nuclear material, the plant would not normally be subject to routine inspection.

89. When a conversion plant or a fabrication plant which has not been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement contains safeguarded nuclear material, the frequency of routine inspections shall be based on the inventory at any time and the annual input of safeguarded nuclear material. Where the inventory at any time, or the annual input, of safeguarded nuclear material exceeds five effective kilograms the plant may be inspected at all times. Where neither the inventory at any time, nor the annual input, exceeds five effective kilograms of safeguarded nuclear material, the routine inspections shall not exceed two a year. The arrangements for inspection set forth in paragraph 60 shall apply to all inspections to be made under this paragraph. It is understood that, for plants having an inventory at any time, or an annual input, of more than 60 effective kilograms, the right of access at all times would normally be implemented by means of continuous inspection. Where neither the inventory at any time nor the annual input exceeds one effective kilogram of nuclear material, the plant would not normally be subject to routine inspection.

90. The intensity of inspection of safeguarded nuclear material at various steps in a conversion plant or a fabrication plant shall take account of the nature, isotopic composition and amount of safeguarded nuclear material in the plant. Safeguards shall be applied in accordance with the general principles set forth in paragraphs 4 to 8 of this Agreement. Emphasis shall be placed on inspection to control uranium of high enrichments and plutonium.

91. Where a plant may handle safeguarded and unsafeguarded nuclear material, India shall notify the Agency in advance of the programme for handling safeguarded batches to enable the Agency to make inspections during these periods, due account being also taken of the arrangements under paragraph 92 of this Agreement.

92. India and the Agency shall cooperate in making all the necessary arrangements to facilitate the preparation of inventories of safeguarded nuclear material and the taking, shipping and/or analysis of samples, due account being taken of the limitations imposed by the characteristics of a plant already in operation when placed under Agency safeguards.

Residues, Scrap and Waste

93. India shall ensure that safeguarded nuclear material contained in residues, scrap or waste created during conversion or fabrication is recovered, as far as is practicable, in its facilities and within a reasonable period of time. If such recovery is not considered practicable by India, India and the Agency shall cooperate in making arrangements to account for and dispose of the material.

Safeguarded and Unsafeguarded Nuclear Material

94. India and the Agency may agree on the following special arrangements in the case of a conversion plant or a fabrication plant which has not been supplied wholly or substantially under a project agreement, submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement by the parties to a bilateral or multilateral arrangement or unilaterally submitted to safeguards under a safeguards agreement, and in which safeguarded and unsafeguarded nuclear material are both present:

(a) Subject to the provisions of sub-paragraph (b) below, the Agency shall restrict its safeguards procedures to the area in which safeguarded nuclear material is stored, until such time as all or any part of such nuclear material is transferred out of the storage area into other parts of the plant. Safeguards procedures shall cease to be applied to the storage area or plant when it contains no safeguarded nuclear material; and

(b) Where possible, safeguarded nuclear material shall be measured and sampled separately from unsafeguarded nuclear material, and at as early a stage as possible. Where separate measurement, sampling or processing is not possible, any nuclear material containing safeguarded nuclear material shall be subject to the safeguards procedures set out in Part III.E of this Agreement. At the conclusion of processing, the nuclear material that is thereafter to be safeguarded shall be selected, in accordance with paragraph 96 of this Agreement when applicable, by agreement between India and the Agency, due account being taken of any processing losses accepted by the Agency.

Blending of Nuclear Material

95. When safeguarded nuclear material is to be blended with either safeguarded or unsafeguarded nuclear material, India shall notify the Agency sufficiently in advance of the programme of blending to enable the Agency to exercise its right to obtain evidence, through inspection of the blending operation or otherwise, that the blending is performed according to the programme.

96. When safeguarded and unsafeguarded nuclear material are blended, if the ratio of fissionable isotopes in the safeguarded component going into the blend to all the fissionable isotopes in the blend is 0.3 or greater, and if the concentration of fissionable isotopes in the unsafeguarded nuclear material is increased by such blending, then the whole blend shall remain subject to safeguards. In other cases, the following procedures shall apply:

(a) Plutonium/plutonium blending: The quantity of the blend that shall continue to be safeguarded shall be such that its weight, when multiplied by the square of the weight fraction of contained fissionable isotopes, is not less than the weight of originally safeguarded plutonium multiplied by the square of the weight fraction of fissionable isotopes therein, provided however that:

(i) In cases where the weight of the whole blend, when multiplied by the square of the weight fraction of contained fissionable isotopes, is less than the weight of originally safeguarded plutonium multiplied by the square of the weight fraction of fissionable isotopes therein, the whole of the blend shall be safeguarded; and

(ii) The number of fissionable atoms in the portion of the blend that shall continue to be under safeguards shall in no case be less than the number of fissionable atoms in the originally safeguarded plutonium;

(b) Uranium/uranium blending: The quantity of the blend that shall continue to be safeguarded shall be such that the number of effective kilograms is not less than the number of effective kilograms in the originally safeguarded uranium, provided however that:

(i) In cases where the number of effective kilograms in the whole blend is less than in the safeguarded uranium, the whole of the blend shall be safeguarded; and

(ii) The number of fissionable atoms in the portion of the blend that shall continue to be under safeguards shall in no case be less than the number of fissionable atoms in the originally safeguarded uranium;

(c) Uranium/plutonium blending: The whole of the resultant blend shall be safeguarded until the uranium and the plutonium constituents are separated. After separation of the uranium and plutonium, safeguards shall apply to the originally safeguarded component; and

(d) Due account shall be taken of any processing losses agreed upon between India and the Agency.

IV. AGENCY INSPECTORS

97. The provisions of paragraphs 1 to 10 and 12 to 14, inclusive, of the Inspectors Document shall apply to Agency inspectors performing functions pursuant to this Agreement. However, paragraph 4 of the Inspectors Document shall not apply with regard to any facility or to nuclear material to which the Agency has access at all times. The actual procedures to implement paragraph 60 of this Agreement shall be agreed to between the Agency and India.

98. The relevant provisions of the Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the Agency (INFCIRC/9/Rev.2) shall apply to the Agency, its inspectors performing functions under this Agreement and to any property of the Agency used by them in the performance of their functions under this Agreement.

V. PHYSICAL PROTECTION

99. India shall take all suitable measures necessary for the physical protection of the facilities and nuclear material subject to this Agreement, taking into account the recommendations made in Agency's document INFCIRC/225/Rev.4, as may be amended from time to time.

VI. SYSTEM OF ACCOUNTING AND CONTROL

100. India shall establish and maintain a system of accounting for and control of all items subject to safeguards under this Agreement, in accordance with provisions to be set out in the Subsidiary Arrangements.

VII. FINANCE

101. India and the Agency shall each bear any expense incurred in the implementation of their responsibilities under this Agreement. The Agency shall reimburse India for any special expenses, including those referred to in paragraph 6 of the Inspectors Document, incurred by India or persons under its jurisdiction at the written request of the Agency, if India notified the Agency before the expense was incurred that reimbursement would be required. These provisions shall not prejudice the allocation of expenses attributable to a failure by either India or the Agency to comply with this Agreement.

102. India shall ensure that any protection against third party liability, including any insurance or other financial security, in respect of a nuclear incident occurring in a facility under its jurisdiction shall apply to the Agency and its inspectors when carrying out their functions under this Agreement as that protection applies to nationals of India.

VIII. NON-COMPLIANCE

103. If the Board determines in accordance with Article XII.C of the Statute of the Agency that there has been any non-compliance by India with this Agreement, the Board shall call upon India to remedy such non-compliance forthwith, and shall make such reports as it deems appropriate. In the event of failure by India to take full remedial action within a reasonable time, the Board may take any other measures provided for in Article XII.C of the Statute. The Agency shall promptly notify India in the event of any determination by the Board in this regard.

IX. COOPERATION, INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF THE AGREEMENT AND SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

104. The Agency and India shall cooperate to facilitate the implementation of this Agreement.

India and the Agency shall endeavour to settle by negotiation any dispute arising from the interpretation or application of this Agreement. India shall have the right to request that any question arising out of the interpretation or application of the Agreement be considered by the Board. The Board shall invite India to participate in the discussion of any such question by the Board.

106. In the event of any question or questions arising from the implementation of this Agreement, the Agency shall provide India with an opportunity to clarify and facilitate the resolution of such questions. The Agency shall not draw any conclusions in connection with the question or questions until India has had an opportunity to provide clarifications.

X. FINAL CLAUSES

107. India and the Agency shall, at the request of either of them, consult about amending this Agreement.

108. This Agreement shall enter into force on the date on which the Agency receives from India written notification that India's statutory and/or constitutional requirements for entry into force have been met.

109. This Agreement shall remain in force until, in accordance with its provisions, safeguards have been terminated on all items subject to this Agreement, or until terminated by mutual agreement of the parties to this Agreement.

132. Press Release issued by the Department of Atomic Energy on signing of a Contract with Russia for long term supply of 2000 tons of natural uranium pellets.

New Delhi, February 11, 2009.

The Department of Atomic Energy and TVEL, a Joint Stock Company of the Russian Federation have signed a contract today for the long term supply of 2000 ton of natural uranium pellets for India's Pressurised Heavy Water Reactors and another contract for about 60 Ton Low Enriched Uranium (LEU) pellets for Boiling Water Reactor units at Tarapur being operated by Nuclear Power Corporation of India Limited (NPCIL). For the two BWRs at Tarapur, Russia had earlier supplied fuel pellets on two occasions, and the present supply is a repeat of earlier contracts.

The president of TVEL with a team of high officials of his company attended the signing ceremony at the head office of the Department of Atomic Energy in Mumbai. The Directorate of Purchase and Stores of the Department of Atomic Energy signed the contract from the Indian side. Imported natural Uranium from Russia will be used in the domestic pressurized heavy water reactors under IAEA safeguards.

This is a major and second agreement, India has signed for the supply of fuel since the changes in NSG guidelines on September 6, 2008 to facilitate international civil nuclear trade with India. Earlier an agreement was signed with AREVA of France for the supply of 300 tons of uranium.

TVEL, a large Russian enterprise deals with nuclear fuel fabrication and supply. It supplies fuel to Russian and many other nuclear reactors in the world. TVEL is also the supplier for nuclear fuel assemblies for Kudankulam Nuclear Power Project (2 X 1000 MWe) being set up in collaboration with Russian Federation at Kudankulam, Tamilnadu. TVEL has already supplied in May 2008, the fuel required for initial years of operation for these reactors.

NPCIL is unique in having acquired, under one roof, comprehensive capability in all facets of nuclear technology namely – site selection, design, construction, commissioning, operation, maintenance and life extension of nuclear power plants

NPCIL has at present 17 Nuclear Power Reactors of 4120 MWe in operation and 5 Nuclear Power Reactors of 2660 MWe under construction. NPCIL has plans for significant capacity addition including nuclear reactors to be set up in technical cooperation with various countries.

133. Address by Special Envoy of the Prime Minister Shyam Saran at the Brookings Institution: "Indo – US Civil Nuclear Agreement: Expectations and Consequences".

Washington, March 23, 2009.

President Strobe Talbot,

Prof. Steve Cohen,

distinguished guests,

ladies and gentlemen: I thank you for inviting me here today and for giving me the opportunity to revisit an initiative that consumed such a significant chunk of our two nations diplomatic energies over the past 4 years and whose progress from start to finish is best characterized as an extended roller-coaster ride. The story of this extraordinary journey will, I have no doubt, be written some day, conveying the sense of drama that attended it every inch of the way. I will resist that temptation of story-telling today, but instead try to focus on new pathways which have been opened up by the agreement, for us to explore together, as we confront a probably more uncertain, chaotic and even dangerous world.

First and foremost, of course, is the direct fall-out from the Agreement in terms of the significant business opportunities it opens up for our two countries. India has already conveyed a letter of intent for upto 10,000 megawatts of U.S. nuclear power reactors at sites that are currently under examination within our Government. State governments, where the potential sites are being considered, will need to be consulted. The good news is that in India, being chosen as a site for nuclear power, is a privilege most states aspire to, unlike the controversy such decisions are dogged by in other countries.

Another procedural measure, important for U.S. nuclear suppliers, is India joining the international nuclear liability convention. I understand that the inter-agency process within government has been concluded. India plans to increase substantially its nuclear power production capacity. International cooperation in civil nuclear energy will be an important means to achieve this goal. Therefore we see joining the international nuclear liability convention as being in our interest and hope to do this soon. In any event, this does not prevent U.S. companies from engaging their Indian counterparts already to prepare the ground for substantial nuclear commerce. On the U.S. side, we await the early commencement of our dialogue on arrangements to give effect to our right to reprocess U.S. origin spent fuel. I understand the new Administration is ready to engage with us at an early date.

Another trade-generating fall-out of the nuclear agreement is sometimes neglected in our discourse over its merits. Over the years, prohibition on the transfer to India, of nuclear-related items, soon expanded significantly, to cover a very broad range of dual use items and technology. With the opening up of nuclear commerce with India, there is a need now to review and remove these unnecessary restrictions on international trade with India on dual use items and technology. As India's economy matures and its industry moves into higher end manufacturing, the demand for high technology goods and services is destined for a major boost. And the U.S., of course, remains the preferred source of such goods and services. It is also our hope that the so-called Entity List, which still prohibits sale of U.S. technology and goods to a number of Indian high-tech companies, will be scrapped, sooner rather than later. The positive impact of a more liberal technology trade regime is already beginning to make an impact on India's sourcing of defence hardware from the U.S.

It is true that India has also been hit by the global financial and economic crisis, and our growth rate is likely to go down 2 or 3 percentage points during the next couple of years. But energy and defence will remain at the top of our national agenda and this should encourage the U.S. to look at India as a welcome source of demand for its goods and services, even as the global economy contracts. 10,000 megawatts of nuclear energy may translate into U.S. $ 150 billion worth of projects, with significant business opportunities and potential collaboration for both Indian and US companies. This would also result in significant and high quality job creation in both our countries. If India maintains its current level of defence spending to achieve its medium and long-term goals of force upgradation, then a growing part of the expected 10 year acquisition plan of US$ 120 billion could be reoriented towards the U.S. This will require the U.S. to overcome lingering Indian doubts about the reliability of U.S. supplies. Simultaneously both of us need to work together to find a mutually acceptable solution which will take care of US legal requirements about end use monitoring of transferred defence articles and also meet our sensitivities. I am certain we will be able to do so quickly given our past experience and also given the interest both our countries have in strengthening this relationship.

Let me now turn to the larger nuclear domain and explore what could be a possible Indo-US agenda for nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament. It is my sense that thanks to the civil nuclear agreement, we are now, potentially, at a different level of engagement on these hitherto sensitive and even contentious issues, compared to the past. For India, the U.S. acknowledgement, endorsed by consensus by the Nuclear Suppliers' Group, that India's non-proliferation record and its current credentials are impeccable, has given the country a welcome sense of vindication. From being an outlier, India is now accepted as a partner in the global nuclear domain. The success of the civil nuclear initiative has engendered a sense of assurance and confidence which enables us to look, proactively and not defensively, at a new global agenda for nuclear non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament.

There are a number of initiatives proposed by President Obama during the presidential campaign, and since his inauguration, that have caught the attention of Indian policy-makers and which could become the agenda for a substantive Indo-US engagement on nuclear security issues. Let me mention a few of them:
